MILK PROFITS UP TO FARMER, SAYS EXPERT

Regardless of business and agricultural conditions, money can always be made from milking cows, says, Hugh G. Van Pelt, eminent dairy authority, writing in the Larro Dairyman for September.

As proof, Mr. Van Pelt states that under any conditions that can be named someone in every neighborhood always is making money from milk. The ability of the farmer and his cows, he declares, determines profits, rather than labor, overhead and feed costs.

"When it seems that everything I must buy is too high," says Mr. Van Pelt, "and everything I must sell is too low—and it has seemed that way now for several years—it is absolutely necessary to remind myself that the profit that comes from milking cows is based more upon largeness and economy of production than upon any other factor."

Mr. Van Pelt declares that the worse general conditions become the more farmers must depend upon their ability to feed and care for cows so as to obtain large and economical production. Only by doing this, he says, can dairymen hope to be classed among those who make money from milk instead of those who lose money.

When milk and butter fat prices are high and labor and feed is cheap, says this expert, it is easy for any farmer to make money milking cows, provided good cows are properly milked and are well fed and cared for.

The real test, he declares, comes when conditions are adverse—when milk and butter fat prices are low and labor and feed are expensive. The point which he insists must be driven home to farmers is that even under these conditions it is possible for dairymen to make money from milk from good cows, which cannot fail to be profit makers if sufficient intelligence and care is used in feeding and milking.

Besides being a nationally known authority as a writer on dairy subjects, Mr. Van Pelt is president of the Waterloo Jersey Farm, and a large operator himself in blooded cattle and dairy products.

Her recent book, "Beginning Again at Ararat," is being used as a textbook on the Near East in schools and colleges.
