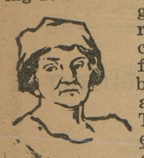
In the Kitchen with 6 Famous Cooks

FIVE WAYS TO PREPARE CHICKEN

These Are Favorite Recipes of Four Famous Cooks

(Editor's Note: This is one of a series of unusual cooking articles contributed to this paper by six famous cooks.)

Chicken is a universal favorite. Very few folks can find it in their hearts to refuse a second helping of this appetizing fowl. Four famous cooks give tempting recipes for cooking it—fricassee, fried, broiled, stewed, and soup. There's variety enough for everyone!



MRS. SARAH TYSON RORER

Mrs. Sarah Tyson Rorer, the Philadelphia cooking expert, has a recipe for a delicious chicken corn soup.

"This is an excellent dish," she says. "With a salad, coffee, and a bit of ripe cheese it makes a wholesome meal."

Chicken Corn Soup

Her directions follow: Singe, draw, and cut up as for stewing a two year old hen. Put it in a kettle, and cover with three quarts of cold water. Bring to a boil, and cook until tender—about two hours.

Remove chicken, skim the broth, and put it back on the burner. Add two medium sized onions chopped, a teaspoon of salt, dash of pepper, and a box of noodles. Add one pint of canned or fresh cut-off corn. Cover and cook 10 minutes. Add the chicken cut into small pieces. When hot, serve. If too thick, add milk to thin.

Delicious Fricassee

For chicken fricassee, made according to the recipe of Mrs. Kate B. Vaughn, Los Angeles cooking expert, select a young chicken, weighing about 3½ pounds. Season pieces of chicken with salt and pepper, dredge with flour, and fry in hot fat until brown. Place in casserole, add water and cook in hot oven, 350 degrees F. for one hour. Keep the cover on the casserole.

As They Cook It "Out West"

Pacific Coast fried chicken is delicious. You have the word of Mrs. Belle DeGraf for that. Mrs. DeGraf is a domestic science counsellor in San Francisco.

For this dish cut one medium sized young chicken as for fricassee. Sprinkle each piece with salt and pepper and dredge with flour. Heat four tablespoons butter or chicken fat in frying pan. Fry chicken until well browned. Cover with hot water. Add one tablespoon minced onion and cook until the chicken is tender, using a low flame. When chicken is done, remove to serving plate. If any liquid remains in pan, drain off in cup.

Put 2 tablespoons of butter in the pan. Add 2 tablespoons of flour. Mix until smooth, then add 2 cups of thin cream, or cream and liquid left to make 2 cups. Stir until creamy. Then add one tablespoon finely shredded green pepper, and ½ teaspoon salt. Simmer a few minutes, then pour around, not over the chicken.

To prepare the green pepper pour boiling water over it and let stand 10 minutes. Shred with scissors.

FATE AND THE TWO PHILOSOPHERS

By RUTH GRIFFITH

(© by Western Newspaper Union.)

DEBORAH HARLAN opened her cigarette case and looked up at her companion sweetly. She liked his profile in the cool moonlight as he drove the car, but she didn't like his argument.

"Why, Sammy, dear, you don't believe all that, do you?" she asked.

"Yes, I do believe it, Deb," replied Sammy Barlow, not without effort, as he looked into the face of the minister's daughter. Deborah's rosy lips parted in a crooked smile.

"And I always thought that doctors, especially young ones, were atheists or infidels or something interesting," she sighed.

Again the doctor looked puzzled into her brown eyes. Large question marks, those eyes seemed, always asking him something.

"Now, Deb," he scolded. "You know I'm quite orthodox, so why do you want to talk about it?"

Deborah placed the cigarette between her lips and shook out the lighted match with a professional gesture. Dr. Sammy Barlow brought the car to a grinding, jerky stop.

"Deb," he said sternly. "I wish you wouldn't."

"Wouldn't what?" she prompted eagerly.

"Wouldn't smoke those confounded cigarettes. I hate to see you do it."

Much to his surprise she flung the cigarette away. Instantly his arm closed about her.

"Deb," he accused, "you want to be a little devil."

"You're right," she admitted, "I always had intended to be a missionary, and to go to teach the heathen that they ought to wear clothes, but I've changed my mind."

The doctor laughed.

"What changed your mind?" he asked.

"Oh, I've come to have a different view of the Adam and Eve story, that's all."

The young doctor knew that to start a discussion of the Book of Genesis would likely mean a bitter argument, so he wisely remained silent. Deb gazed off through the distance and he watched her face. That face seemed a mirror in which were reflected many personalities so often did the expression in it change. Finally he took her hands in his.

"Deborah, dear, when are you going to marry me?" he asked. She looked at him, feigning surprise at the question.

"Why, Sammy! Never, of course."

"Deb, I'm not joking."

"Neither am I."

"But you must marry me."

"All right," she sat up quickly, and looking at an imaginary book in her hand, began to recite in a solemn tone:

"Dearly beloved, we are gathered together in the sight of God and in the presence of these witnesses to join this man and woman in the bonds of holy matrimony—" she paused.

"Don't Deb," said the supposed groom rather weakly.

"Sh!" she scowled at him, and went on: "Owing to the lateness of the hour we will be forced to omit part of the ceremony. Sammy, wilt thou take this woman for thy wedded wife?" Deborah looked at the doctor expectantly.

"Say you bet!" she whispered.

"I will," replied the doctor solemnly.

Deborah dropped the book and settled back in the seat.

"Now we're married," she assured him. But Sammy was in no mood for burlesque.

"Deb, won't you really marry me?"

"No, Sammy," she answered emphatically.

"Why not?"

"Because I love you too much."

"But, Deb—"

"Yes, I know what you are going to say, but I mean it."

"Deb, Deb," the doctor muttered, and Deborah saw that his fists were clenched.

"Then we must stop this," he said finally.

"What?" she asked innocently, and then without waiting for an answer, went on: "Don't get melodramatic, Sammy; you don't know the tune. Besides, you'd better drive on. We don't need to stay here all night." Doctor Barlow closed his mouth like an oyster, pushed in the clutch and gave his attention to the road and his roadster.

"Now, Deb," he finally demanded, "just leave out all of that Socratic questioning and answer one question for me, will you?"

"Proceed," she said slowly, but with a twinkle in her eyes.

"Will you marry me?—say yes or no."

"No."

"Don't you care?"

"I don't believe in marriage at all, Sammy.

"Where under the heavens did you get such an idea?"

"By watching dad marry so many, I suppose. They just seem to pour in—those people, some good, some bad, some poor, and some rich, with consent and without consent, widows and widowers, and some with several marriages already to their credit—all coming to hear dad say those words that I just said to you—"

"But where did you get that ridiculous idea of marriage, Deb? Surely not just from seeing people get married."

"Well, no, not only from that. But you see, I see them that day and then I look at them a year or two later and draw my own conclusions concerning marriage."

"You probably saw only the conclusions that you were determined to find. You didn't look for any good results, did you?"

"Yes, Sammy," she answered patiently. "I looked, but I looked in vain." Another silence and Sammy drove quickly. He didn't know where he was going, but he had a vague idea that he was off the Southern trail which they had intended to follow. He felt Deborah's head on his shoulder.

"It's dark tonight, Sammy, isn't it?" she said.

"Yes, it's dark for me tonight, Deb, but not only the road—everything," he assured her.

"Melodramatic again, Sammy," she accused. "Can't you love me without marrying me?"

"I suppose I can if I have to," he replied. "What are those two lines of Henley's that I've heard you say so often, Deb?"

Deborah settled her head more comfortably on his shoulder and chanted in a Baptist sing-song:

"It matters not how strait the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll:
I am the master of my fate:
I am the captain of my soul."

"Do you believe that now, Deb?"

"I don't know," she replied thoughtfully. "I'd like to—do you?"

"No—yes, that is, until two masters meet, and then we need Fate to decide the argument."

"Well, Fate generally decides, doesn't she?"

"Generally, yes. But sometimes she seems a little tardy." Deborah smiled, but Sammy did not see the smile.

"Deb," he said, "there's another car on this road, and we thought it was our road."

Deborah looked at the glaring headlights that were so quickly approaching them.

"Sammy, is this road wide enough to pass that car?" she questioned nervously.

"Oh, yes, but Lord, it's dark! I'm going to drive to the side and wait." He pulled to the side and slid the gear into neutral. By the light of the passing car he caught a glimpse of a bridge in front of him, and before his hand left the gear shift he felt the sickening rock of his car, heard the sound of tearing earth, and realized what was happening. In a flash he had flung Deborah to the side and taken her place. A sharp, ragged pain went through him, he was conscious of a heavy weight on his back. Reaching out his arm he tried to call Deborah, but he could only whisper, and the pain of moving his arm made him faint.

He awoke to a sensation of coolness. He opened his eyes, but couldn't see. Something was over them. Suddenly he remembered the bridge, just as he had seen it by the light of the passing car; he supposed then that he was in the water; that was the reason it was so cool. Frantically he stretched out his hands and called loudly:

"Deb!"

His hand touched something—Deb's head, he knew. In a panic he was sure that she was dead. He started up wildly. Somebody uncovered his eyes and he looked wonderingly up into a tall man's face.

"Calm down, now," the tall man was saying to him, "there's nothing to get so excited about. You're in a hospital and not under a bridge."

"Deb?" he inquired hoarsely.

"Here I am, Sammy."

He saw her kneeling by his white bed.

"Are you hurt, Deb?"

Her face was pale, but as she smiled two tears slipped from her eyes.

"No, Sammy, I'm not hurt—only my ankle twisted a little." Sammy sat upright.

"I'll fix it," he assured her; "where is my case of bandages?" The tall doctor pushed him back on his pillows.

"I'm the doctor now," he said.

"Sammy, dear," she said, "do you remember what you said just before we—went over?"

"Why, yes," he smiled rather weakly; "it was something about Fate deciding, wasn't it?"

"That's it, Sammy, and Fate decided," she answered.

"What, Deb?"

"When are you going to marry me, Sammy?"

"Right now!"

Deborah laughed. Some one passed and glanced puzzlingly in at the door that the tall doctor had left ajar.

"But Deb, your philosophy of marriage?"

She kissed the bandages on his forehead.

"Philosophy?" she questioned quaintly. "Oh, yes. Well, I guess I left my philosophy under the bridge."

Mean Advantage

"Your honor, it was a case of mistawen identity," pleaded the crook.

"Mistaken identity?" questioned the judge.

"Yes, your honor. The cop was in plain clothes and I didn't know he was a policeman until he had me pinched." announced the crook.—Cleveland News.
