ORIGIN OF "BULL AND BEAR"

These Common Terms Go Back to the Early History of the British Stock Exchange.

So well established have the terms "bull" and "bear" become that they are defined even in the least colloquial of dictionaries as "one who speculates or wagers upon a rise in stocks" and "one who speculates or wagers on a fall." The commonly accepted explanation of the use of the terms formerly was that the bear claws or pulls the stock down, while the bull tosses it up, at it were, on his horns. But this is really nothing more than a guess, and the real origin of the phrase "bull and bear" is buried somewhere in the early history of the British stock exchange.

Here, says the Detroit News, it appears that the earliest use of the idea was in the proverb about "selling the bearskin before one has caught the bear," which was applied to all transactions on the exchange or elsewhere where there was no immediate transfer of goods, but only a payment to be made at some future time according as the goods had advanced or receded in price.

In "The Anatomy of 'Change Alley," published in 1719, occurs the sentence: "Those who buy Exchange Alley bargains are styled buyers of bearskins," and in 1744 the terms appear to have come into common usage, for the London Magazine of that year refers to "bulls and bears," while George Coleman, in his "Man of Business," uses them in precisely the same sense in which they are employed at the present time.

HOW MANY STITCHES IN SUIT?

Some Patient Person Over in England Has Estimated That They Number About 45,000.

There are approximately 45,000 stitches in the average man's suit of clothes, according to an announcement recently made in an English paper by some amazingly patient and observing person, presumably a tailor. This result is reached by the following calculation:

To the average-size pair of trousers, 8,000 stitches are allotted. Of this number about 5,800 are machine made, the rest being made by hand, chiefly in the form of finishing work to the waist, pockets and turn-ups, or "cuffs."

In the vest or waistcoat there are, he declares, roughly, 5,500 stitches. The percentage of handwork is higher in this garment than in the trousers, the lining usually being put in entirely by hand-made stitches, as well as the finishing work. The figures are 3,400 machine, and 2,100 hand stitches.

But it is in the coat that the big totals come. In that garment, he says, there are, on an average, 30,000 stitches. The pockets and the large number of seams account for much machine work, while the lining and refinishing entail many hand-made stitches. Of the latter there are more than 8,000 in the average coat. There are also to be taken into consideration the tacking and fitting stitches, which, as above announced, brings the total up to something like a round 45,000.

Maximilian's Beautiful Beard.

Maximilian of Austria, "the pale archduke from overseas," had one of the most nearly perfect beards of all time. It has been much mentioned in poetry, and is recorded as full of gleams and glints. Ruben Dario, in one of his Mexican poems, christened Maximilian el Principe de Barbas-de Oro—Prince of the Beard of Gold. Victor Hugo should have been called, says the critic, the Bard of the Elegant Beard. Whiskers of authors rather fascinated Dario. He dedicated verses to the famous Spanish novelist, Don Ramon del Valle-Inclan, as "This renowned Don Ramon with the goat's beard distinguished."

William Penn Smoked With Women.

William Penn has a fine record in the history books. Controversy and colonial muck raking has not sullied his name. But William Penn smoked with the women. He smoked with them right out in public. In fact, they took puffs from the same pipe. Twice at least did this happen.

But it was a peace pipe; a Calumet which he smoked with the big chiefs and the braves and the squaws of the tribes that were selling him land. He made a fine trade for a first-class piece of land, paying for it in part with 800 tobacco pipes, 100 hands of tobacco and 20 tobacco boxes.

Had the Laugh on Teacher.

Preliminary to taking the final examination we reviewed the work we had covered during the semester. The teacher called on me to differentiate between "debit" and "credit," and when I was almost through reciting, he said, "Are you reading that?" I said, "Yes, sir, I—" The teacher interposed with, "I thought so. That isn't what I wanted you to do." The class laughed, but I turned the joke on the teacher by completing my sentence with, "I am reading it from memory."—Chicago Journal.

Foresaw the Results of Victory.

Willie—Aw! Your'e afraid to fight; that's all it is.

Jack—No, I'm not; but if I fight my ma'll find it out and lick me.

"How'll she find it out?"

"She'll see the doctor goin' to your house."—London Answers.

ROMANCE OF FANEUIL HALL

"Cradle of American Liberty" Was Built by Son of French Huguenot Refugee.

An interesting romance is woven around old Faneuil hall in Boston, often referred to as "the cradle of American liberty." Andrew Faneuil, a French Huguenot, was driven from home by the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He fled to Holland, and thence to America, and was admitted by the governor and council of Massachusetts Bay colony Feb. 1, 1691. He was an able business man, and became the richest man in the colony through trade in a general store. His fortune passed to his son, Peter, and Peter proved both a practical and public-spirited man. He offered to erect a public market building at his own expense if the town would provide proper regulation. The farmers, accustomed to peddle from house to house, opposed this plan, but it passed by a majority of the 727 votes cast.

Peter Faneuil did more than he had promised, for in addition to the market he built a second story with a hall for town meetings and other public functions. On August 27, 1765, the first mass meeting of protest against the stamp act took place in the hall. The meetings to protest against the tea tax were held in the hall in 1773, and the result was the Boston Tea Party of December 16. When Lafayette visited the building in 1824, he said: "May Faneuil Hall stand forever, a monument to teach the world that resistance to oppression is a duty, and will under true republican institutions become a blessing."

EARLY SETTLER POMPOUS

Pioneer Colonist in America Seemed to Lack the Saving Sense of Humor.

A persistent respect for the pomps and vanities of feudalism with its distinction of classes and its conventions of respectful observance was held by the early settlers in the American wilderness. They showed a curious lack of a saving sense of humor. When the first settlement at Jamestown was starving, Sir Thomas Gates, on relinquishing his authority, fired a salute from the fort, and made his departure like a king abandoning his realm. De la Warr, arriving a few days later, landed with a flourish of trumpets and a procession, with banners borne before him. When he went to church he was attended by an escort in red cloaks and a guard of 50 men, although there were not more than 200 in the colony.

When the Puritans, a people who were supposed to have laid aside the pomps and vanities, went to church, they were summoned to Captain Standish's door by the roll of a drum. Each man wore a cloak and carried a musket on his shoulder. They fell in three abreast, led by a sergeant, and behind this escort strode Elder Brewster with Captain Standish strutting stiffly at his side, with a sword in scabbard and bearing a cane or wand as an emblem of his authority.

Whitman Had a Checkered Career.

Walt Whitman began his career as an errand boy in a lawyer's office and tried in turn working in a printer's office, teaching in a country school and editing the Brooklyn Eagle. He founded and edited his own paper, the Long Islander, but gave it up and tried building and selling small houses in Brooklyn.

During this checkerboard career, Whitman was continually writing poetry, and finally in 1855 he published a small book containing a collection of his poems, under the title of "Leaves of Grass." It was characterized by Emerson as "the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America had yet contributed."

Whitman's life was a poet's life—free, unhurried, unworldly, unconventional, unselfish, cheerful, optimistic, and it was contentedly and joyously lived.

What Pinckney Really Told France.

When John Jay, in 1796, made his famous treaty with England, which threatened to involve the United States in a war with France, the Directory would not receive the American ambassador, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, but intimated that the payment of a certain sum might settle the dispute. Pinckney is said to have indignantly answered with the now historical phrase: "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." It is said, however, that long afterward, when Pinckney was asked in his club whether he had ever uttered it, he replied: "No. My answer was not a flourish like that, but simply, 'Not a penny, not a penny.'"

A True Story.

An office boy in a big business house approached one of the clerks and with great solemnity asked him to divide 180 by 10. "Eighteen of course," was the immediate reply. The boy looked thoughtful. "Are you sure?" he asked. The clerk thought there was a catch somewhere but was assured that the boy was in earnest. "I've worked it out over and over," he said, "and it comes out 17 and 10 over," he explained.
