When Paul Came Home.

By LULU JOHNSON.

[Copyrighted, 1907, by J. G. Reed.]

Paul Westerly cast a curious glance about the office as he took his seat at the big flat topped desk. Eight years before he had stood in front of that same piece of furniture while he had listened to Guy Masters' scathing denunciation of his effrontery in aspiring to the hand of his employer's daughter. Dismissal had followed the arraignment, and Paul had been told not to set foot inside the place again.

Now he was to sit in Masters' old seat and control the destinies of the plant. The same narrowness which had regarded the suit of his assistant foreman for his daughter's hand as an insult had kept Masters out of the print trust until too late. He had lost the plant, and it was Paul who had come to take charge for the new owners.

This was the first time he had been in the office since his dismissal. There was less change than he expected to find. The carpet was a little rusty, the desk lacked the high polish that once had been the standard and the gilding of the picture frames was a trifle tarnished. The whole place, in fact, bore mute testimony to those two lean years before the obstinate old man had given in to the new order of things.

There were flowers on the desk to make welcome the new manager. Paul read some of the names on the cards and smiled grimly. He could remember the time when he had been taxed dimes and quarters for the flowers of policy. Now he was the recipient of the shop blackmail.

It was for him that the collection had been taken up in the various departments. He touched a bell, and a boy came in.

"Set those flowers on the side table," he ordered. "Keep them fresh as long as you can. Take these on this side of the table first that I may get my desk in order."

Paul moved slightly back that the boy might first clear the writing space.

"THIS EXPLAINS MUCH," SHE SAID AT LENGTH.

The lad lifted over to a side table the elaborate set pieces, and as he moved away one particularly large piece a smaller bouquet was disclosed.

It was just a little cluster of pansies, rich, velvety blossoms that reminded him of the pansy beds at the master's home. He caught up the flowers and searched eagerly for a card. There was none attached to the bunch, nor did a search reveal a card pinned from the stems.

Then with sudden memory he examined the leaves that encircled the blooms, and his heart gave a leap, for on the shiny green surface of one was traced a four leaf clover and the initials "L. M." It was a little trick he had employed in those days when he had sent flowers to Lilith Masters. These, then, were from her, and she remembered him kindly, even though he came to take her father's place.

He had not supposed that she was in town. He had understood that she had married and gone to England to live. He had had no direct communication with her after he had left the little mill town to seek other employment. A dozen times he had written her in care of her old nurse, but no answer had come, and at last he had given her up.

He had supposed that she had forgotten him entirely, but the pansies appeared to tell another story, and it was with a warm glow at his heart that he went about the business of straightening things up.

As he moved from the office he could almost see Lilith as she used to look when she came down in the trap to take her father home. It was here that he had seen her one afternoon when he had come to bring a message from his foreman. He had loved her then, though he was but sixteen and she three years younger. Later on he had come to know her through her interest in the benefit society maintained in the factory, and eventually he had won her love.

Then had come his declaration to her father, his dismissal and his search for work elsewhere. He had rapidly risen in his new employment, and the trust decided to give him charge of the Masters mill when Guy Masters, weary of the struggle, sought the rest that lies beyond the grave.

The little floral offering brought this all back more strongly than ever. Perhaps he would see her. Perhaps she would explain why it was that she had not answered his passionate letters. He had thought then she had determined to put him out of her mind, but the flowers told another story. She had always loved pansies best of all the flowers.

He whistled her favorite air as he moved about the office settling things to his liking. He was still whistling when he brought up in front of the door of the big safe. It was filled with a mass of papers, most of which Paul knew could be of little value.

Mr. Masters had had an almost superstitious dread of destroying any paper.

Rapidly he drew from the pigeonholes the accumulation of years and threw them on his desk for examination. Far back in the safe he came across a package that caused his eyes to open wide. Neatly banded with tape were the letters which he had sent Lilith eight years ago.

He had sent them to Lilith's old nurse to be given to her. Only the outer envelope had been opened, and the inner covers were still sealed. Masters would bribe to gain possession of the letters, but apparently his sense of honor prevented his reading them.

Paul turned them over curiously. The cheap paper was yellowed and stained. At best they had been poor things, the best that he could afford at the time. He smiled as he drew toward him his own personal paper with its embossed heading upon the heavily laid surface. Many things had changed in those eight years. He wondered if Lilith had changed with the rest. She had been seventeen then. Now she must be twenty-five. If she had been married, as he had been told, she must begin to look matronly by now. Perhaps there were children—it seemed funny to think of children in connection with Lilith. She was still a child herself in his mind's eye.

If she had never received his letters he did not blame her for marrying. Doubtless she had thought that he had forgotten. Forgotten! As if he ever could forget!

So sunk was he in his reverie that he did not notice that some one had entered until a voice broke the stillness, and he sprang to his feet. For an instant it seemed as though the concentration of his thoughts had materialized a vision, for before him stood the girl who had been in his mind all day.

"Don't let me disturb you," she said, "but I came to ask for some of father's personal papers. I thought it would be best to wait until a representative of the purchasers came before asking for them."

"Is it really you?" he asked. "For a moment it seemed a vision, you look so like your old self. I thought marriage would change you."

"Don't tell me that you heard that absurd report of my marriage. Sir Henry was three years older than father, and he came over to investigate the mill. That was all. Was that why you did not write?"

Paul handed her the package of letters.

"I found them in the safe," he explained simply. "Evidently our trust in Mrs. Willis was not well founded."

Curiously she turned the packet over in her hands. The tears came into her eyes as she realized that her father had withheld the letters.

"This explains much," she said at length. "I thought you ceased to care."

"I have never stopped loving you," he said passionately, "not even when I read that you were married."

"Nor I," she admitted; "not even when I thought you had forgotten."

Silently they regarded each other as their hands met in a clasp more eloquent than words. Paul looked out through the glass screen at the busy works beyond. "This is indeed a home coming," he said at last, and Lilith smiled response.

Proved His Case.

"In Kansas many years ago," said a real estate lawyer, "a man brought suit before the squire to recover some land that had been outrageously filched from him. His case was a good one, but the other side had doctored its witnesses, had even doctored the plaintiff's witnesses, too, and up to the time when he took the stand himself not a jot or tittle of testimony in his favor had been recorded.

"He, as soon as he was sworn, turned to the justice and said:

"'Squire, I brought this suit, and yet the evidence, excepting my own, is all against me. Now, I don't accuse any one of lying, squire, but these witnesses are the most mistaken lot of fellows I ever saw. You know me, squire. Two years ago you sold me a hoss for sound that was as blind as a bat. I made the deal and stuck to it, and this is the first time I have mentioned it. When you used to buy my grain, squire, you stood on the scales when the empty wagon was weighed, but I never said a word. Now, do you think I am the kind of a man to kick up a rumpus and sue a fellow unless he has done me a real wrong? Why, squire, if you'll recall that sheep speculation you and me'—

"But at this point the squire, very red in the face, hastily decided the case in the plaintiff's favor."—Cincinnati Enquirer.
