What Agriculture Needs

By WARREN G. HARDING

Concerning the grim reality of the present crisis in agriculture, there can be no differences of opinion among informed people. The depressions and discouragements are not peculiar to agriculture, and I think it fair to say there could have been no avoidance of a great slump from war-time excesses to the hardships of readjustment. We can have no helpful understanding by assuming that agriculture suffers alone, but we may fairly recognize the fundamental difficulties which accentuate the agricultural discouragements, and menace the healthful life of this basic and absolutely necessary industry.

Even in our own times and under the most modern and enlightened establishments the soil has continued to enjoy less liberal institutions for its encouragement and promotion than many other forms of industry. Commerce and manufacturing have been afforded ample financial facilities for their encouragement and expansion, while agriculture on the whole has lagged behind. The merchant, the manufacturer, the great instruments of public transportation, have been provided methods by which they enlist necessary capital more readily than does the farmer. A great manufacturing industry can consolidate under the ownership of a single corporation with a multitude of stockholders, a great number of originally separate establishments, and thus effect economies and concentrations, and acquire for itself a power in the markets where it must buy, and in the markets where it must sell, such as have not been made available to agriculture.

Farmer Is Individualistic.

The farmer is the most individualistic and independent citizen among us. He comes nearest to being self-sufficient; but precisely because of this he has not claimed for himself the right to employ those means of co-operation, co-ordination, and consolidation which serve so usefully in other industries. A score or more of manufacturers consolidate their interests under a corporate organization, and attain a great increase of their power in the markets, whether they are buying or selling. The farmer, from the very mode of his life, has been estopped from these effective combinations; therefore, because he buys and sells as an individual, it is his fate to buy in the dearest and sell in the cheapest market.

It cannot be too strongly urged that the farmer must be ready to help himself. By this I mean that, in the last analysis, legislation can do little more than give the farmer a chance to organize and help himself.

Take co-operative marketing. American farmers are asking for, and it should be possible to afford them, ample provision of law under which they may carry on in co-operative fashion those business operations which lend themselves to that method, and which, thus handled, would bring advantage to both the farmer and his consuming public. In countries where these facilities and opportunities have been afforded such co-operative organizations have been carried to the highest usefulness and are recognized as aiding both farmer and consumer. They make the farmer's selling price higher and the consumer's buying price lower.

Must Help Himself.

But when we shall have done this, the farmers must become responsible for doing the rest. They must learn organization and the practical procedures of co-operation. These things we cannot do for them, but we can and should give them the chance to do them for themselves. It will be for them to demonstrate their readiness and willingness and ability to utilize such instrumentalities. There is need for wide dissemination of information and understanding of methods, and for development of what I may call the spirit and purpose of co-operation.

It is apparent that the interest of the consumer, quite equally with that of the producer, demands measures to prevent these violent fluctuations which result from unorganized and haphazard production. Indeed, the statistics of this entire subject clearly demonstrate that the consumer's concern for better stabilized conditions is quite equal to that of the producer. The farmer does not demand special consideration to the disadvantage of any other class; he asks only for that consideration which shall place his vital industry on a parity of opportunity with others and enable it to serve the broadest interest.

Badger Farmers Like Plan.

The farm bureau plan for the co-operative marketing of potatoes and grain in Door County, Wisconsin, has met with immediate success and little trouble was experienced in signing one hundred contracts. Indications are that many more farmers will avail themselves of this co-operative marketing machinery in Wisconsin. Contracts signed in the vicinity of Sturgeon Bay include approximately 100,000 bushels of potatoes.

HOT AND COLD

In days that are hot prepare for days that will be cold. This is not a command. It is just plain common sense. Animals do this. In summer they get ready for winter. Why shouldn't man do the same? He should. But he likes to put off until tomorrow the thing he knows he should have done yesterday.

Don't wait. Now is the time to have your heating plant put in order—gotten ready for the first cold day.

To wait will not make the cost less. Chances are a wait will make the job cost more. The first cold snap will bring a rush of orders. The rush will mean busy days, overtime, a line of waiting customers.

Don't wait. Many Fall colds are caught on chilly days while the family's waiting around for a heating plant to be fixed. Colds cost time and money—more time and more money than you will have to pay to put your heating plant in order.

Wait for the cold days if you want to. But, as sure as you're alive, you will then have to pay in money, in medicine, in suffering, in discomfort.

"Do it now" is the only way to protect your family.

"GIVE ME WHITE PAPER"

This is the first line of a forgotten poem, by Edward Everett Hale. Under this heading, Honorable Henry T. Rainey discusses the new world changes which confront us now—the failure of the financial systems of great nations; the tremendous debts; and possible changes in money standards; the new and strange ideas which accompany this period of unrest; the awakening of China; Bolshevism in Russia; Pacific problems; peace and disarmament, what it all means.

Mr. Rainey discusses the possible insolvency of great commercial nations; what effect it would have. In its swing through the centuries this old world has entered a new era. We are starting out upon new and unnavigated financial seas, all leading up to the idea that the road to national success, to happiness and prosperity, must be found only by obliterating the past We must write the history of the future without much reference to the distressing events of the recent past. In the course of the lecture Mr. Rainey takes occasion to discuss the secrets of the committee rooms, conferences with the President during the first year of the war, not yet made public. Mr. Rainey was the ranking member of his party on the Ways and Means Committee, which had charge of the preparation of all the war bills. He handles the subject in a popular, intensely interesting, entirely non-partisan way, free from technicalities and burdensome statistics. He is an accomplished orator and widely known. Mr. Rainey is one of the lecturers on the Chautauqua program to be given here this year.

when Water gets in the Crank Case

Trust this live experience!

IN more than a half century's constant study of lubrication we have met and solved many hard problems. To take one for example, why water gets in the crank case and what to do about it.

About a pound of water is formed by the process of burning a pound of gasoline. Most goes out the exhaust—the remainder, always heavier than oil, drops to the crank case. Clean oil and water will not stay mixed. Dirty oil will emulsify and quickly lose its value. Experience therefore teaches us to manufacture Polarine absolutely clean—to urge you to drain your crank case often and always fill with fresh Polarine of the proper consistency.

Economical lubrication demands a single reasonably priced, widely distributed oil of outstanding quality that solves every problem. Polarine is that oil, the built-up result of hundreds of trying experiences. You can safely trust our long, live experience to protect your motor by quality products and sound advice.

The Polarine Chart advises the consistency of Polarine that for your car best combines easy flow, heavy work, lasting wear and low mileage cost. Consult it at your dealer's.
