CHRISTMAS ON INDIAN ISLAND.

BY W. E S. FALES.

The fierce tribe of Penobscot warriors which once dominated Maine, New Brunswick and Quebec is now represented by a thriving civilized community on Indian island not far from Bangor, in the commonwealth of Maine. Here for nearly a century they have been trained and educated by the devout Roman Catholic sisters, aided by a few priests from our own people. They have become civilized and Christianized and are today among the best citizens of the state. They are proud of their lineage, and they speak, read and write English.

In matters of faith they are devout Romanists and observe the festivals of their church with fidelity and zeal. Their priestly advisers with commendable wisdom have encouraged all of their old rites which are poetic, entertaining or marked by the love of nature.

Christmas is the great day of their year. No small boy with delirious visions of Santa Claus looks forward to the festival with more delight than these children of the forest. The week before homes and churches are trimmed with evergreens and flowers, the decorations uniting the conventional methods of the great cities with the freer and more graceful styles of their own race. The Indian blood comes out in the profuse use of antlers, elk horns, deer heads, bows and arrows, stained porcupine quills, eagle feathers and birch bark panels for decorative purposes.

AN INDIAN ISLAND BE LE IN CHRISTMAS ATTIRE.

Their own band gives what may be called a continuous concert, playing the latest compositions and more especially the anthem songs and dances written by the Penobscot composer and musician, Hon. Horace Nicolar, formerly a representative of the tribe in the state legislature. The performers are Indians, and the music has a strange flavor of the ancient moon dance and war dance.

Everybody gives Christmas gifts to everybody else, and in the giving there is considerable common sense, utility rather than mere ornament being the feature of the presents.

Christmas afternoon there is always a dress parade. Young men and young women warmly dressed in half Indian costume stroll up and down the snowy streets, skate upon the waters which surround their home or ride in sleighs. They are a fine looking procession. The men are tall, erect and muscular and the women bright eyed, exquisitely proportioned and as graceful as swans. Some of the belles would be stars in New York drawing rooms.
