"UNREDEEMED PLEDGES."

One of the Ways In Which the Unwary Are Tricked Out of Money.

Recently there have been added to the city's heterogeneous commerce several little shops which offer for sale, mostly at auction to the highest bidder and to the only bidder, too, if his bid be high enough, jewelry and other articles that go under the name of "unredeemed pledges." There are tricks in all trades, and this particular trade is the sublimation of all tricks.

In the first place, there is something alluring in the term "unredeemed pledges."

All such stores employ men with phenomenal lungs, who cry their wares in basso profundo. In one of them there is a fellow with a voice that would be conspicuous in a den of roaring lions. He is always coherent, and the volume of breathy sound that comes from his mouth seems to be reverberated from every surface in the establishment. Generally he is telling the merits of a certain watch or the price he has just been offered for the timekeeper, and as a passing pedestrian reaches the doorway he raises his voice a little, which secures an involuntary turn of the head. Often curiosity is aroused, and the passerby goes in to investigate.

When one enters the shop, the "auctioneer" is probably announcing he has just been offered a ridiculously low price for a fine pair of earrings.

"Gentlemen, are you going to let this elegant pair of earrings go at that price?" he asks, and there seems to be a genuine distress in his voice.

Perhaps the next article offered is a watch.

"Ah! What have we here? A watch? Well, so it is, and a beauty too!"

And then he goes on to tell how the owner of the watch was forced to part with it. It is always a pathetic tale—young man; health failing for a long time; no money saved; mother dies suddenly; the watch is pawned to pay for the funeral of the dear old lady.

He sighs deeply, but stifles his emotion and proceeds with the sale.

"Look at this watch and tell me what you think of it," he says to a tall individual standing near the showcase.

"I have no need of a watch," replies the man.

"But look at it. You don't need to buy it."

A critical examination of the watch follows, and then the man who "had no need of it" offers perhaps $5. The bid is at first scorned, but after much talk is reluctantly accepted.

If any one bids 25 cents more, the watch is immediately sold.

The man who offers the $5 is a "tout." He goes from shop to shop. Three or four are employed, and they go from shop to shop, making the first bid on every piece of gold plated jewelry that is offered for sale.

There is one tall "tout" who wears glasses and who has been employed so long that even the most unwary look at him askance. Often he is forced to "make a bluff" at buying the brass. It is safe to estimate that he has "bought" at least 2,000 watches during the past two years.—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

A Typical Scot.

"Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who has just been installed chancellor of St. Andrew's university in succession to the late Duke of Argyll," says Mainly About People, "is a typical Scot, who has always taken life seriously and has won his way by sheer hard work from the status of a 'sma' Scotch laird' to the honorable position he now holds. He took honors at Oriel in 1871—the attainder of his ancient barony had been reversed in his favor two years previously—and his portrait hangs in the common room among the other worthies of that famous college. The new chancellor is a dignified man of two and fifty, tall, handsome, grave and portly and will be in all respects a dignified figurehead of the venerable university by the North sea."

Jealous Artists.

A certain set of English artists are jealous of the decorative work done abroad in France and in Germany. At a time when British artists are received well in all countries it is very regrettable that a lack of fair play should be shown by Englishmen to continental painters and craftsmen. Not very long ago, when England was powerfully influenced by French art, many Frenchmen believed that nothing good in painting or design could be done by Englishmen, and now that this error has passed away a section of the English public becomes hostile to French artists.—London Studio.

Difficult Civilizing.

Referring to the difficulty of civilizing Sioux Indians, Miss Annie B. Scovy writes, "The government tried to civilize these Indians by [illegible] wagons, and they used them to feed the ponies from stoves, and they knocked off the tops and used them over the campfire; cows and the Indian saw in them what he had in the buffalo—meat—and ate them up."

God Save the Queen.

It is stated that the king and queen have approved of the following verse being added to the British national anthem:

In perfect peace serene
Keep thou our gracious queen;
With her abide.
May heaven's own sunshine fair
Rest on her everywhere;
Hear thou thy people's prayer,
God save the queen.

Wants the Seats Filled.

The Baptist minister of Phillipsburg, Kan., advertises in the local paper: "There still remain a few vacant seats at the regular services in the Baptist church of this city. The pastor will and can preach better sermons if the seats are all filled with worshipful attendants. Will you not come?"
