Prevention of Smut in Wheat

During the past few weeks many inquiries have been received by the Experiment Station regarding the treatment of smut in wheat and considerable damage is reported in many sections of the Eastern Shore. It has been estimated that in price alone, farmers this year in the smut district have lost $300,000 Some wheat selling as low as 65 cents per bushel on account of smut. This is an unnecessary loss as the smut which causes this loss can be easily prevented by treating the seed as described below:

There are two kinds of smut, the stinking smut and the loose smut. The two are easily distinguished from each other. The stinking smut, as the name indicates, has a characteristic odor and is usually not discovered until harvest or threshing time. The loose smut appears at heading time, the whole head being almost a solid mass of smut. Later it all disappears and only the stem of the head is left. The stinking smut is the most objectionable and it greatly deteriorates the value of the flour. Loose smut never lessens the selling value of wheat and the only damage is the decrease in yield which in Maryland the past two seasons varied from a trace to ten per cent.

The stinking smut is distributed by the spores (the black smut dust which corresponds to seed in higher plants) adhering to the grain. And in order to prevent this smut, all that is necessary is to kill the adhering spores. It seems to be necessary for the smut spore and wheat grain to be planted in the same place or no infection results. Infection by scattering in fields is very slight, if any at all takes place.

There are a number of substances with which the seed can be treated for stinking smut but the most simple as well as cheapest is formalin. This should be used at the rate of one pound (one pint) to 40 or 50 gallons of water. Wet the seed with this solution thoroughly either by immersing or by sprinkling. If the seed is immersed, it should be left in the solution for ten minutes then spread out to dry. If the solution is sprinkled on, the seed should be raked over until every grain is thoroughly wet, after which the seed may be piled up and left for one-half hour or a little longer and then spread out to dry. After the seed is dry it may be sacked and used when needed. It will take nearly a gallon of solution to one bushel of wheat.

The treatment for loose smut is much more difficult. The seed must be first soaked in cold water for five to seven hours, then immersed for ten minutes in hot water heated to 130 degrees F. If the temperature goes above 132 degrees F. the germination of the seed will be injured; and if the temperature falls below 124 degrees F. the treatment is not effective.
