Live And Let Live.

Jonathan Carter sat on his commodious piazza in the most contented frame of mind possible, for he was basking in the sunshine of prosperity. As far as the eye could see the hills, and the flocks on the hills were hi The house was his. So was the fine new barn filled with harvested grain. Farmer Carter did not look up and claim the sky, but that, too, was part of his domain.

At that moment something came around the corner of the house that he did not recognize in any way belonging to him. This something was a tramp.

"Sir," said he, "will you be so kind as to give me a bite to eat? I am very hungry."

It would only be natural to suppose that Jonathan would have given a generous meal to this offspring of humanity—but he did nothing of the kind.

"Be off," he said, "or I will set the dog on you."

"I will work," began the tramp.

"Oh, you will? I don't need your help. I employ men to work for me—not such cattle as you."

His words cut to the quick, as he intended they should. The tramp made a savage spring forward and a look of hate crossed his features—then he stopped—swung around and slouched away.

"Cattle?" He flung the words out with bitterness. "You're right, friend, only—cattle that are made in God's image and human."

"So! The fellow's had a schooling," was all the comment the farmer made. He did not see a humanitarian transaction at his back door when his good wife handed out a repast of bread and meat to the hungry tramp.

No, Jonathan Carter saw nothing of that. He was watching a speck far down the valley, that was a whole world to him—his only son galloping from farm-house to farm-house, where his playmates live, showing them his new possession, the poney his father had given him for a birthday present. The farmer did have soft spots in his nature, but they were for "me and mine."

The hobo lay on the side of a hill far enough away to be unrecognizable and ate Mrs. Carter's bounty in a semi-savage mood.

"Cattle, what is he? I'd like to make him suffer; yes I would. Oh, I could die dappy just to see that man in my place."

Between every mouthful he devoured would recur some anathema of speech as he lay and watched the man he hated, but he divided his attention. His eyes were fixed now on the splendid barn that had cost the farmer so much money and was the pride of the surrounding country. The fellow writhed with impatience.

"I hope he'll read the writing on the wall and know the tramp's hand. I hope he'll—ha—its working."

He saw a thin spiral of smoke rising like a crooked forfinger from the roof of the barn. The farmer, sitting with his back turned, did not see it. The tramp watched it and smiled as Cain might have smiled when he slew Abel. He gesticulated fiercely as if to sustain himself in some awful deed; then another look came into his face as he saw a boy ride gayly up to the barn, turn his horse loose, and carrying his saddle on his arm, disappear inside the building.

One—two—three minutes passed. Nothing had changed except that thin spiral of smoke. It was now a column cut off from the roof by a blaze that the sunlight shielded. Jonathan Carter was asleep in his chair. The tramp rose to his feet. His expression and the evil purpose that had possessed him changed to a look of keen purpose. His form seemed to expand and grow taller, but he stood rooted to the hills.

The farmer was aroused now. His wife and daughter were running wildly here and there shrieking fire, and he was calling to his men to aid him. But there was no help that could save the smouldering mass, and no man that could enter that fiery furnace.

"Let it burn," shouted the farmer; "thank God we are all here safe—no life will be lost."

At that moment his eye fell on his son's pony grazing in the field nearby. "Alfred!" he shouted, where is Alfred? Is he in the house?"

At that moment a man darted past him and disappeared in that seething mass of smoke and flame. The group paid no attention to him, the father and mother running distractedly about calling for the boy who was the pride of their lives. Then there came a cry from within the blazing barn, a smothered cry, caught up and reechoed in anguish by those outside as they recognized the voice.

"It is my boy—let me go to him!" shouted the father, struggling in the armes of his men, "I will save him or die with him."

But they could see the shadow of a man who walked like Shadrack of old in the fiery furnace, but unlike him there was the smell of fire upon his garments, and if the Saviour of men walked with him their eyes were holden that they could not see. He carried a burden that he had covered with his tattered coat.

The fire fought him and wound its long tendrils around him. It put out the light in those bloodshot eyes forever. He was literally blazing when he gathered up the last remnant of his failing strength, and threw his safe burden to those who met him half-way. Then there was a roar and a crash, and never did man have a more glorious funeral pyre. He who had lived an outcast had died a hero.

She Used Her Hand.

Once my sister Floy was sent on an errand for some things for my mother.

There was a traveling man there who was selling carpet spankers,

"Has your mother got one of these spankers?"

"No, sir," she replied.

"What does she use?" he asked.

"Her hand," was the prompt reply.

Didn't Play Fair.

Said an indignant mother to her young son: "Why did you strike little Elsie, you naughty boy?"

Dick, indignant in his turn, exclaimed: "What did she want to cheat for, then?"

"How did she cheat?" asked mamma, more mildly.

"Why," exclaimed Dick, "we were playing Adam and Eve, and she had the apple to tempt me with, and she never tempted me, but went and ate it up herself."—Tit-Bits.

Rural Mail Delivery.

By the end of the present fiscal year the Post Office Department expects to have in operation 21,000 rural mail delivery routs throughout the length and breadth of the land. The many millions of dollars spent in this direction are well applied, and those who live in towns and cities have no conception of the far-reaching advantages of the rural delivery system. This free distribution of mail matter in the country districts means that hundreds of thousands of farmers are receiving their papers daily, that they are getting their letters as quickly as they would receive them if they lived in a town or city, that they do not have to lose time going for their mail matter daily or two or three times a week. In other words, it means that hundreds of thousands of farmers and other residents of rural districts are kept in daily touch with the outside world, and thus are enjoying the same advantages and privileges that are vouchsafed to town and city residents.

When the rural mail delivery idea was first suggested there was some opposition because of the enormous expense involved, yet the system was put into effect and the money spent is an excellent investment for the government.

The work of the rural mail system is to go on, and at the coming session of Congress additional money is to be provided for continuing and enlarging the scope of the service.

Of course the increased expense to the Post Office Department may result in the continuance for an indefinite period of years of the annual deficit in the accounts of the department. Nevertheless the government is rich enough to make up the shortage and put all the people of the country on the same footing. One-cent letter postage is being demanded, but it will have to be postponed for a few years, and in due time a reduction of rates will follow, just as the reduction came when three cent postage was followed by two cent postage. There is nothing cheaper in the way of personal accommodation than the cost of mail matter. Two cents will send a letter three thousand miles just as it will send it across the street of a city, and one cent will carry the average newspaper. The people get full value for every stamp they use and they have no occasion for clamoring for one-cent postage so long as the goverment has to make up an annual deficit.

Try for Health

222 South Peoria St., Chicago, Ill., Oct. 7, 1902.

Eight months ago I was so ill that I was compelled to lie or sit down nearly all the time. My stomach was so weak and upset that I could keep nothing on it and I vomited frequently. I could not urinate without great pain and I coughed so much that my throat and lungs were raw and sore. The doctors pronounced it Bright's disease and others said it was consumption. It mattered little to me what they called it and I had no desire to live. A sister visited me from St. Louis and asked me if I had ever tried Wine of Cardui. I told her I had not and she bought a bottle. I believe that it saved my life. I believe many women could save much suffering if they but knew of its value.

Georgia Dunbar

Don't you want freedom from pain? Take Wine of Cardui and make one supreme effort to be well. You do not need to be a weak, helpless sufferer. You can have a woman's health and do a woman's work in life. Why not secure a bottle of Wine of Cardui from your druggist today?
