When A Man's In Love.

When a man's in love he fondly deems
The days all made for signs and dreams;
There's sweetness in each breath of air,
And every prospect stretches fair;
In every stone a jewel gleams,
The sun sheds only golden beams,
Glad songs are sung by all the streams,
And loveliness is everywhere,
When a man's in love.

Forgetting wicked, worldly schemes,
For him there's music in the screams
The night cat utters! People stare
And say he's daft; he doesn't care
How great a fool they think he seems,
When a man's in love.

—Chicago Record-Herald.

A Maid of Dreams.

Miss Wilcox turned with sudden exasperation to the man beside her. "What is the matter with you to-night, Mr. Vice?" she demanded. "What are you thinking of so intently? Not of the people around you—which is your duty; nor of me—which should be a pleasure; nor even of your dinner, which, with a man, is most remarkable. Pleas try to remember that this is supposed to be a merry gathering, not an hour for solemn meditation."

Vice came out of his reverie instantly. "I beg your pardon, Miss Wilcox!" he exclaimed. "I have been very remiss, I acknowledge. But if you knew—" he broke off abruptly.

"Well," returned the girl, half shyly, "why shouldn't I know?

Vise hesitated. A young novelist, a writer of sentimental tales, popular with men because of the humor in his pathos, and with women because of the pathos in his humor, he was accustomed to make love both easily and charmingly—on paper. In real life, he was as a nun, and shrank from everything even remotely approaching the sentimental. This was why, for nearly a year, he had been trying to tell Margaret Wilcox that he loved her, without once being able to get out the words. Like many another brilliant writer, he wrote the passion he did not dare to voice.

Now he glanced around at the smiling faces of the dinner guests In just such a situation, he had time and again placed his characters, excricating them in good time with a skill for which he had long since become noted. Why should he not imagine himself one of his own heroes, and force himself to act as that hero would have acted? After all, real people could not be more obstinate or harder to manage tl an the fictitious characters of an author who declined to coerce his creations. His last hero had proposed at a dinner table; should he be weaker than that which he had made? When Miss Wilcox had invited his confidence, she had unwittingly given him a lead by reminding him of a half forgotten experience of his own; why should he not take advantage of the fact to try to lead the conversation up to the fateful words. He would do it.

Meanwhile the girl had been watching him, with lips that twitched in spite of herself. "Well," she questioned lightly, as he lifted his eyes to hers, "have you made up your mind to confide in me?"

"If you think it will not bore you?"

"No danger of that."

"Thank you. It's about a girl."

"Most stories are. I am a girl myself. Go on."

"I first saw her in Cuba four years ago, just after one of the fights before Santiago. We were advancing through a thick undergrowth that split us up into squads that grew continually smaller. Before we had advanced a mile, I had lost sight of all but six of my company; the others I could hear thrashing about in the brush, but as far as seeing them—as well try to see through the proverbial millstone.

"I knew they were there, however, so my little party pressed on, just as dozens of similar squads were doing, until at last we came out into a little glade, carpeted with tall grass but bare of taller growths. How welcome it was after struggling with that horrible, stifling vapor-bath jungle, you may imagine.

"But its welcome was treacherous. Cool and serene as it looked, bullets were fairly swarming across it. Probably it was in a direct line with some exposed part of our advance. At any rate, the moment we stepped into it, two of my men were shot dead, and the next instant I went down myself, insensible.

"When I dropped, those who were left standing promply squatted and crawled up on all fours to look at each of us. Finding the other two dead, and me, to all appearances, the same, they went on to the front."

"They left you? The cowards!" Miss Wilcox's face was white and her eyes blazing. "How dared they?"

"Oh, it was their duty. The army couldn't stop because two or three men were shot. They—" he drew back as a waiter laid before him a frilled cup containing a dessert-spoonful of peas and mushrooms. "Rather good, these," he commented, critically. "Try them. By the way, it's rather warm in here, don't you think?"

"Not as warm as it was before Santiago, I imagine," returned the girl instantly. "Pleas go on."

"Well, I lay on the ground, unconscious, while the battle raged around me, advancing and retreating—lay there, in fact, until the moon, rising above the treetops, shone into my eyes and gave a fillip to my consciousness, calling upon my swimming faculties to collect themselves.

"It wasn't altogather easy. You know how the moonlight alters distances and deepenes shadows, even up here? Well, our moon isn't a circumstance to that in the West Indies. Always larger and brighter than anything you see up here, that night it seemed to fill the whole heavens. It was as big as a hogshead, as big as a mountain. I was weak and wounded, and I believe I cried out in sheer terror because it seemed about to fall upon and crush me."

"You poor boy!"

"Not as poor as you think, for at my cry a girl suddenly appeared in the glade—a place where by rights no girl could possibly be. I think of it a girl at that place and hour between the two armies! It was incredible—but it was true."

"You're sure you weren't delirious and—seeing things?"

"That's what I asked myself later. But I have evidence that I was really awake, and that the girl was genuine, not a mere maid of dreams. I shall come to this later. But anyhow, no dream scene could possibly be quite so vivid as this was. Why, I remember every feature of that girl's face, and could describe them all as accurately as if I were looking at them now. Shall I catalogue them?"

"Pleas do!" Miss Wilcox was evidently deeply interested.

"Well," went on the man coolly, gazing into the dark orbes of his companion, "her eyes were dark brown, shot through the iris with a corona of yellow; her hair had a luster that was iridescent even in the cold moonlight, and must have been glorious in the sunshine; her teeth—well, the trite old simile to pearls is the only thing that suits the occasion."

"And her nose? demanded Miss Wilcox, eagerly, as she recovered from this exceedingly particular description of charms so absolutely resembling her own. "What was her nose?"

"Her nose? It was the dearest little snub in the world," returned Vice, looking straight at the Roman profile of his companion.

"Oh, indeed. I hope she explained her presence there without a chaperone."

"You shall hear. She came to my side, picking her way with careless speed through the grass tufts, knelt beside me, and laid her hand on my forehead. At her touch all fatigue fell from me, and I tried to spring up. 'There, there, lie still!' she exclaimed. You will need all your strength soon. Gathering a handfull of aromatic leaves from a bush, she swiftly shaped them into a poltice, which she placed upon my head, binding it firmly in place with a handkerchief taken from her own neck. 'You are between the lines,' she said, 'and are in great danger. Your troops have fallen back a mile or so, and the Spanish sharpshooters are hiding in all these trees around here, waiting for the morning advance. If you are not in camp in two hours, you will never be. Now try to get up."

"Lamely I struggled to my feet, too foolish to accept her offered help, and turned toward her. Heavens! I knew her the moment the moonlight fell on her face—knew her from the crown af her shining hair to the tips of her dainty feet—knew her for the ideal girl of whom I had dreamed all my life, and for whom I had watched and sought unceasingly. I loved her; oh, how I loved her!

"Something of my passion must have shone in my face, for she laid her finger on my lips, checking the rising tide of feeling. Not now, beloved,' she whispered. 'Later you shall tell me—later; far away; not here nor now. Come. We must go. Lean on me.

"She passed her arm around me and supported me with the full strength of her warm young body, urging me on.

"Out of the wood and into the road we came at last. Our view was wider then, and we could see the universe swimming round us in waving circles; the moon, boxing the compas as no moon ever did before; the tall stars, dipping and curtsying and zigzagging in a gigantic reel across the Milky Way. Many a a world must have come to ruin in the course of that fantastic dance I fancy I must have been a trifle delirious." He looked at Miss Wilcox anxiously.

"I fancy you were," returned that young woman, somewhat grimly. "But go on. What did she do when you got to camp?"

"You will see that I don't know. There are several things about that night that I don't know. I don't know, for instance, how far nor how long we walked along that road I took no account of time; with her by my side, I should have been glad to go on forever and forever. I was filled with happiness; pervaded with it. What cared I for friends, for camp, even for country? My world was there. But all things must end, and, at last, my guide stopped and pointed at a tiny light in front. 'There are your friends,' she said; 'you can reach them now. Good by.'

"'But say that I shall see you again. Don't leave me without a word.'

"'Yes, you will see me again—at home—far away from here.' Before my very eyes, her figure dishmaed and was gone, leaving me staring at the broad road, white in the moonlight.

"I believe I must have gone mad for the moment. I know I rushed foward with outstretched arms, trying to clasp her again; know that the stillness was broken by the sharp hail of a sentry, quickly followered by the low whip-like crack of a Krag-Jorgensen and the thudding of its bullet. Then I pitched, unconscious for the second time that day.

"I revived a few seconds later to find men of my own company bending over me. 'Faith, it's the Captain,' one of them was saying. 'he's the lucky man'

"'Where is she?' I cried, starting up.

"'Where is who, Captain, sor?'

"'The lady who was with me here a moment ago. Here! On the road?'

"The sargent scratched his head. 'A lady, is it?' he said. 'Sentry, did you see anything of the lady?'

"'Sorry a sight, sergent. The Captain came down the road all alone.'

"I covered my face with my hands. Had I really dreamed all that had seemed to pass in the last hour. I could not believe is. Suddenly a means of proof came to me. I grasped at the bandage still fast upon my head and tore it off, reckless of consequences. 'Liar!' I grasped. 'Here is her handkerchief, still warm from her touch.'

Vice paused and drank some wine. "Well?" demanded Miss Wilcox, interogatively.

"That's all. I was sent to a hospital and then home. But I brought the handkerchief with me, and have kept it by me ever since. I have it here to-night. Should you like to see it?"

"Indeed I should."

The man took a filmy web from his pocket and passed it to Miss Wilcox, who took it with a supercilious look that quickly changed to one hard to interpret. "Mr. Vice," she exclaimed, severely, "this handkerchief is too small to bandage even the smallest head, and besides—it is mine!"

"What." exclaimed the man "Yours? Are you sure."

"Yes, I am sure."

Vice drew a long breath. "That's good," he returned, briskly. "Then it follows that you must be the ideal woman whom I have longed for all my life the woman for whom I have waited; the woman whom I have loved." He broke off suddenly "Do you know?" he continued, with an entire change of tone, "I had suspected this for a long time, but didn't dare to ask, fearing that you might not confirm my belief. You do confirm it do you not—Margaret?"

Miss Wilcox blushed charmingly "How on earth did you get such an idea into your brain? Was it on the spur of the moment?"

Just then a voice from across the table broke in on the conversation. "Vice," it said, "I'm intensely interested in that serial of yours running in the——Magazine. It's the best thing you ever did, old man. That Cuban ghost story in to-day's issue is simply immense. How is it going to turn out? I suppose your hero finds his girl and marries her?"

"I'm hardly prepared to say just yet, Colonel," returned the young man. "Suppose you ask Miss Wilcox here what she thinks about it. Does he find and marry her, Miss Wilcox?"

Miss Wilcox blushed again, and her eyes shone like stars. "I haven't read this month's issue yet," she responded, "but I've heard that ghost story told, and I should say if he doesn't—it must be because he hasn't any enterprise about him."

BANNER SALVE

The most healing salve in the world.

The Doctor Said "Stick To It."

Geo. L. Meard, of High Tower, Ga., writes: "Eczema broke out on my baby covering his entire body. Under treatment of our family physician he got worse as he could not sleep for the burning and itching. We used a box of BANNER SALVE on him and by the time it was gone he was well. The doctor seeing it was curing him said: 'stick to it for it is doing him more good than anything I have done for him.'"
