THE LATE COLONEL LEGG.

A High Tribute Paid Him By Unknown Correspondent.

An unknown correspondent to the Chestertown Transcript, in its last issue, paid the following tribute to the memory of the late Col. Wm. Henry Legg, who was well known in Caroline county, and who endeared himself to an influential circle of friends during his life, all of whom mourn with his family his demise.

"Among our many departed citizens, few, if any, have left a more enduring memory than Mr. William Henry Legg, popularly known as 'Bill Henry Legg,' originally of Kent Island, the well-known politician and good fellow whom death claimed a few years ago. Everyone knew 'Bill,' and no matter what company he was in, 'Bill' never shut his eye or his heart to the claims of friendship. To know him once was to know him always; to meet him once was the same as to meet him a million times, as 'Bill' had but one face—and that was a good one—which he wore every day in the week, including Sunday, and which left the impression that its owner was a whole-souled, upright, square, good fellow, who left sunshine and laughter in his back, and because of which it might be said, 'He left the world better than he found it.' If a man who has made two blades of grass grow where only one grew before is accounted a philanthropist, how much more justly can the man be so termed who makes two smiles grow where none existed, who brings even the approach of a smile to the sad and melancholy hypochondriac—and all who cannot laugh are hpochondriacs.

"Few realize the value of laughter, which is dinamic common sense. It is Kinetic Faith Hope and Charity. In it, as in the poet's flower from the cranied wall, lies implicit all the wisdom of the sages and the seers and a balm for every woe. Cultivate healthy, hearty laughter if you would be happy and spread happiness around you. This was 'Bill' Henry Legg as all remember him. Consequently he held public office nearly all his life, and if he was living now would be still 'holding on.' To his credit are two terms in the Legislature; Custom House, Baltimore, four years; Cattle Scales four or five, etc., etc. Those who knew 'Bill' Henry Legg will joyfully join with us in saying 'Requiescat in pace.'"

Mr. Abell Declines.

Walter W. Abell has declined the appointment as a member of the Public Utilities Commission. His declination came in a cablegram from Pekin, China, and directed to A. S. Abell, his brother. The message is as follows:

"Arrived at Pekin today. Cable received. Appreciate appointment, but decline owing to absence. Notify Governor. W. W. ABELL."

Mr. Abell's refusual to serve as a member of the Commission is no surprise to his friends. It had been predicted from the first that he would decline the appointment, for as trustee of a portion of the Abell estate he would in all probability have been compelled to part with securities in the public-service corporations, in Baltimore city, of which he is a large holder.

It now becomes necessary for Governor Crothers to name a third man on the Commission to serve with James M. Ambler and Philip D. Laird, who have buckled down to hard work. One hearing has already been held and others are in sight.

With the exception of the Commissioner needed to make the board complete, the Commission is in fair shape for going ahead with its work. It now has a secretary and a chief clerk. Orgaanization has developed to the point where it is no longer necessary to delay because of it.

Pennsy's Good Showing.

Figures just compiled by the Pennsylvania railroad system show that in 1808 and nine its various lines carried a total of 299,762,658 passengers on its 24,000 miles of track and only one passenger was killed as a result of a train wreck. In other words, the chance of a passenger losing his life in an accident on the Pennsylvania railroad system was one out of about 300,000,000.

In 1909 the number of passengers carried by the Pennsylvania railroad system was 158,067,115. This was an increase of 11.55 per cent. over the 141,685,543 carried in 1908. The number of passengers carried one mile on the Pennsylvania system in 1908 and 1909 was 7,170,568,517, so that for each mile traveled over the system the chance of being killed was one in more than seven billion.

The Maryland, Delaware and Virginia Railway, and the Baltimore, Chesapeake & Atlantic Railway, two of the Pennsylvania's subsidaries operating steamboats on the Chesapeake Bay and rail lines on the Delaware-Maryland Peninsula, in the two years hauled 819,937 passengers and not one was killed as a result of a train accident. No employees have been killed in this way, and no passengers have been injured. Only one employe was injured as a result of a train accident.

Concerning Comets.

What is a comet? It is a heavenly body mostly surrounded by tail. A comet's tail has length and breadth, but no thickness, being so thin you can see through it. Astronomers have not yet discovered whether the comet wags the tail or the tail wags the comet, and they are not trying to, because it would go on just the same if they did The difference between a comet's tail and a cocktail is so apparent that if you went up to the rail and asked for a comet' tail, the barkeeper would be likely to tell you that you had 'em again and to get tell out of there. The part of a turkey that gets over the fence last is the tail end, but the tail end of a comet is not so easy to locate. Usually a comet's tail is as harmless as a rabbit's, but the one now swishing through the sidereal heavens is said to be composed largely of twenty-cent gas and is dangerous to life. This sounds like a Consolidated Gas Company's hint for dollar gas, and maybe it is.

Do not attempt to step on a comet's tail, because no one knows what might happen if you did. And do not try to drive a comet the way you want it to go, as you would a steer, by twisting its tail. The reason is obvious. A comet does not use its tail to shoo the flies away, because there are no flies on a comet, even when it gets near the Milky Way. Several million persons have recently suggested in print and elsewhere that a comet may be caught by putting salt on its tail, but nobody has done it because nobody seems to want to catch a comet and wouldn't know what to do with it if they did catch it. Besides, it may be a joke to say that.

However, a comet's tail is no short story and cannot all be told in one writing.

P. S.—We do not believe any editor in this country would have space to print a comet's tail, anyhow.—W. J. Lampton, June Lippincott's.

Marries Them by Hundreds.

Though Mayor J. Harvey Spruance will not complete a year in his present position as Mayor of Wilmington until the 30th of nextmonth, up to the present time he has officiated at 115 marriages, which is believed to be the largest number ever performed by the mayor of that city in a year This is taken as an indication that the custom, on the part of non-residents, of visiting that city to be married is growing. The mayor of Wilmington is the only official in the State authorized to perform a marriage ceremony. All ministers have that authority, however, as has also any person designated as the leader of a religious congregation.

The pistol wielding career of Walter hunter, colored, of Centreville, was brought to a sudden termination for the second time this month by the local officers Saturday night after he had attempted to kill his wife at their home in a colored settlement near that town. The ball missed her head by only a few inches and lodged in a nearby wall. His wife is at the home of friends and he is occupying a cell in jail.

Mrs. Elizabeth Wonderly, a native of Smyrna, and an inmate of the Methodist Episcopal Home of Philadelphia, was 107 years old Tuesday, May 17. Despite her extreme old age she is active. She arranges her own room and spends much time in sewing and reading. Her grandfather lived to be 105 years old and her father died at the age of 99 years. Mrs. Wonderly distinctiy recalls events of the war with Great Britain in 1812. She has lived in Philadelphia since 1860.

Centreville is to have twice the hitching space as heretofore. The Town Commissioners have completed arrangements for renting the Ford lot on Commerce Street, and will immediately begin the construction of ample racks on this space. Two rows will be built, the same length as those now in use, and the rack on Broadway will be extended about forty feet. The new hitching space was necessitated by the removal of the iron fence from around the Court House square.

Seven trespassers on the Pennsylvania Railroad were arrested and committed to Dover jail on Thursday last. Railroad Detective Jerry Campbell was in the act of arresting one when the man attacked the officer with a razor. EASTERN SHORE RAILROAD

Fast Trains and Steamers From Ocean to Baltimore.

It is reported on good authority that a new and independent railroad will shortly be built on the Eastern Shore. The proposed route is from a point on the Atlantic seaboard near the intersection of the Maryland and Virginia Peninsulas, thence in a generally northwesterly direction to Queenstown, where connection will be made with a line of fast steamers owned by the same company, and furnish direct and frequent service between Love Point and Baltimore. Among the principal towns which will be reached by the main line of the new road are Easton, Salisbury, Cambridge, Berlin, and Snow Hill.

The road is to be built by New York capitalists principally, though a number of Baltimoreans are said to be interested in the enterprise, which will be of inestimable value to Baltimore, in that Eastern Shore people will thereby be afforded facilities for spending a good part of the day in Baltimore and reaching their homes the same night. It is claimed that surveys for the new line have been completed and a considerable proportion of the right of way secured.

The promoters believe that the discrimination which the Pennsylvania Railroad has long shown against Baltimore and in favor of Philadelphia, so far as Eastern Shore traffic is concerned, has furnished them an opportunity to successfully compete with the railroad that has long monopolized the territory referred to and practically dictated to its inhabitants as to where they should trade. It is believed that both the people of the Eastern Shore and Baltimore will appreciate the opportunities which the new means of intercommunication will afford them, and liberally patronize the new road to an extent that should make both its passenger and freight traffic profitable almost from the time it is open for business.

The new road will occupy an enviable position, in that no other line on the Peninsula reaches anywhere near the number of important towns that will be connected up by the one in contemplation. Under present conditions it is necessary for any one living in either of the towns mentioned, when he wishes to go to Baltimore, to first take a train on one or the other of the three roads, all controlled by the Pennsylvania, which run north and south, and transfer to a train on the Maryland, Delaware & Virginia at either Ellendale, Greenwood or Queen Anne Station, which will finally land him at Love Point and permit him to take a boat to Baltimore, which should cover the distance in about half the time it actually takes to do so.

The new road will tap practically the whole of the Maryland Peninsula through its intersection with the following roads which pursue a generally north and south direction and are to be crossed at right angles: Delaware, Maryland & Virginia, Delaware Railroad and Delaware & Chesapeake.

The Bashful Young Man.

A bashful young man was invited out to dinner. He was very much agitated. He sat opposite a mirror and discovered that he had forgotten to comb his hair. Then he dropped his fork on the floor and as he stooped to pick it up he upset his coffee. Matters went from bad to worse until finally in despair the young man quit eating and put his hands under the table. The loose end of the tablecloth was lying on his lap. When he touched it he turned pale. He thought it was his shirt and that he had forgotten to put the garment in his trousers. Afterward, when the family arose from the table there was a crash. The dishes lay in a broken mass upon the floor. The Young man pulled three feet of tablecloth out of his pants and flew to the woods.

PAY ENVELOPE NO. 9

It was six o'clock on a dull Saturday evening in late November. Thick gray clouds filled the sky, and the smoke that poured from the sooty throats of the somber factory and mill chimneys hung close to the earth and made the atmosphere as impenetrable as a fog. From the great yards at the Mt. Clair Iron Works a long line wound slowly out, a line of tired, blackened men. Usually they poured from the foundry in a great black mass, but on Saturdays it was different. Saturday was payday, and the men must march slowly by the paymaster's little window and call out his number, receive the envelope containing his weeks pay and march on out the gate. It was by means of this method that the time keeper could keep tab on the many men under his charge.

Harvey Fleetwood was near the head of the line on this particular day. His young wife was very sick and he was in a hurry to get home to her; so, in spite of the protests of the men, he pushed his way to the front until he was the fifth one from the head.

"Number Nine," he called, and in a moment received the envelope so so numbered, was jostled on, and had soon hurried from the yard. Once outside the grounds and apart from the men he savagely tore the envelope open. "Ten dollars, and here I owe the doctor that much for Mollie's medicine. Then the kids need clothes and we have got to eat. What will I do if she does not get well?" he groaned, and took the money from the envelope. For a moment he stood amazed, then gave a long, low whistle, for there in his pay envelvelope were twenty dollars. He looked at the envelope. It was his, Number Nine. It was sealed when he got it, so the paymaster could not know that he had made a mistake. The money was his, and the doctor would be paid.

At first he could not believe his good fortune, but the two ten-dollar bills crinkled in his hand. It was true. His first impulse was to rush home and tell Molly, but, on second thought he decided not to. Molly was peculiar; she would say the money was not his, and would not rest until he had taken it back. Besides the office was closed now, and he could not take it back now until Monday morning even if he wanted to, which he did not.

Ordinarily Harvey would have decided to go to the paymaster and tell him of the mistake, but with so many bills to be paid and Molly so sick it seemed a god-send to him, and he resolved to keep the ten dollars and say nothing of it to the paymaster or to his wife. The doctor would be paid, and he would have his regular wages to keep them through the week. With this decision he satisfied himself.

Owing to a shortage of orders the men in the molding department had been told not to return until nine o'clock Monday morning, so the foundry was deserted at eight when the president of the company strode into the cashier's office. After greeting his subordinate, he said:

"Harrison threw up his place as foreman of the molding and casting department Saturday. He was getting too old for the work, so we will have to pension him. Been with us a long time, thirty years. That means promotion for some one in the department, and I cannot decide whom to put in."

"Have you no one in mind who is able to fill the position as well as Harrison did?" asked the cashier.

"Oh, there are several who can do the work, but that is not the question. We need some one who is thououghly honest, as he will have the handling of all the orders, and a smart man could easily filch money from us by short-ordering and taking the difference between the order and the bill he gives us. I had in mind that young Fleetwood. He is a good worker, and seems to be honest. I have no way of telling if he is honest, for I will not abuse the confidence of my men by setting traps for them, and —answer the telephone there, Watson."

When the cashier turned and hung up the receiver there was a smile on his face.

"You will not have to set a trap intentionally to test Harvey Fleetwood, and yet, there will be one," he said.

"What do you mean?" the president rose from his chair as he asked this question.

"Carlton, the paymaster in the molding department, has just wired me that he inadvertently put ten dollars too much in Harvey Fleetwood's pay envelope Saturday night. Fleetwood is number nine and Jones is nineteen. Jones worked overtime last week and made twenty dollars. Carlton put the same amount in number nine by mistake. He will not be here until Wednesday, and he has asked me to fix it up."

"You are right; that will be the test of Harvey Fleetwood's honesty and of his ability to fill the position left vacant by Harrison, for if he proves his worth in this matter I will give him the place."

"It is now ten minutes of nine," said the cashier. "You can remain here and see what he does. The men all come in by the large gate there, and we can see as soon as he enters if he is coming here."

The shrieking whistle now broke the silence and rendered further speech imposible. The continued tread of feet was heard, now and then a laugh or a few words as the men passed on their way to work. The two men in the room looked anxiously at the gate until it seemed that all the men were in, then, as they were about to give up, Harvey Fleetwood walked in and came at once toward the office. Harvey had spent a miserable Sabbath at the bedside of his wife. She had been too sick to notice that the usual cheery smile had left his face, and so the confession that she might have had from him was lost. The doctor had left word that no more medicine would be forth-coming until his bill was paid and this made Harvey all the more determined to keep the ten dollars given to him by mistake the night before. Monday morning came, and he picked up his tools and lunch box to start to work. He went in to kiss his wife goodbye. She put her arms around his neck and whispered:

"Never mind, Harvey, I will soon be well. I do not mind how poor we are so long as you are honest." With a sob he hurried from her bedside into the next room, took the ten dollars and replaced it in the envelope. He would be honest. He would trust God; surely He would provide. Then he hastened to his work.

When he entered the gate he went straight to the office to tell the cashier of the mistake made in the pay envelope. He hesitated when he saw the president, but when he had nodded to him to proceed, he said:

"There was a mistake made in my pay envelope last week and I got ten dollars too much. Here it is sir," and he laid it upon the desk.

"Keep it," returned the president. "You deserve it for your honesty; the mistake was ours." The astonished Harvey left the office. When he had gone the president said, with a satisfied smile:

"I think Harrison's place is filled."

Harvey hastened home that night with the ten dollars and the astounding news that he was promoted to foreman and his salary doubled. The news acted better than a tonic, and Molly was soon her old self. It was then that he told of the pay envelope, and to hear her praise was ample reward for his honesty, together with the joy at receiving the new position. He was glad that he had not yielded to temptation.—New York Observer.
