GIVE THEM YOUR SUPPORT

Are you helping the firemen and the women make the first annual firemen's carnival a success? These energetic women and men are working hard toward goals which are for you. Unselfishly for weeks they have been meeting, planning and working for the success of this carnival. During the past week many have given days of their valuable time to the successful carrying on of this carnival. Will you not give of your leisure hours in the evening to help swell the crowds that are gathering nightly on the carnival grounds and then, when everything is going on in good time, give of your earnings the small sums asked.

These towns people are not working hours and days in hard labor for personal gain. Their one and only ambition is to do something for YOU. The firemen want a fire engine to better protect Your home and your business from that dangerous enemy—FIRE. The ladies of the Community Club are working for a Community House, a recreation centre, where, during the winter evenings entertainments, games, etc. may be held for the mental education of both old and young. Are these two ideals not worth your attention? Help them in this, their first carnival, and they will gladly "carry on" and fulfill their ideals, that You may be benefited, that you and yours may be protected from fire, that you and yours may be given a wider view of life and make living more pleasurable.

Don't give only the pennies that you don't want. Give the dollars that you need and want. They are the ones that count, they are the ones that spell progress and prosperity.

THE CONSTRUCTIVE STATESMANSHIP OF SENATOR JOSEPH IRWIN FRANCE

As the date of the primary election draws near at hand friends of Senator Joseph Irwin France, who seeks the nomination next Monday, point to the constructive record of the Maryland statesman during the five and one-half years in which he has represented the people of this State in the upper house of Congress as justifying his becoming the standard bearer of the Republican Party in the Senatorial election again this fall.

From the time that Senator France announced his intention to become a candidate for re-election he has based his chief claim for continuing in this important office upon his record of service faithfully and intelligently performed in the interest of American citizens everywhere.

Senator France's campaign has lacked anything suggesting a hurrah or attempting to stampede the electorate into supporting him upon any other ground than the dictates of intelligence carrying with it the conviction that his public record has been the result of mature deliberation upon what was best to be done in the national and international crises and problems that have confronted us during his term.

Those who have followed the career of Senator France, as he has pursued the winding path of progress, of purpose to fame, from messenger boy to a foremost statesman, will be impressed by the fact that there have been more varieties of service to his credit than falls to the lot of most men. Senator France has been, in season and out of season, earnest, effortful and effective.

Suppose one were just to plunge into his record of the early part of his career, where would he be apt to find himself? Beside a young man of education and training, who almost at a jump, after entering politics, became a national figure. The other day, a conversation upon a train was overheard between two men, in which one of them, not a Marylander, declared, "This little old state is doing its darndest to produce a Roosevelt." Maryland is willing to permit California and some other states to put forward men who have the laudable aspiration for the Roosevelt rating. For itself, while it holds in vast admiration Roosevelt, Lincoln and many others not born within its borders, has such distinguished names to its own credit, that it is satisfied to rate Senator France as pre-eminently a Marylander, of Maryland quality, and of the high celebrity that from time to time Marylanders have attained in the nation.

Where is there another living statesman so varied and versatile as Maryland's senior Senator? He was a physician, but he stopped prescribing medicine in order to prepare pellets for the political organism.

He still has something of the stamp of the doctor. Look at his Public Health Bill for the formation of a National Department of Public Health, a measure that is as sure to eventuate in a department of the Government to bring together the public health services of the nation and those of the states, as the sun is to rise. Then, too, his splendid bill providing for an appropriation of forty-five millions of dollars for hospitals for the care of the sick and disabled soldiers, a bill indorsed by the Surgeon-General of the Public Health Service and by the leading surgeons in the Army.

Among health measures that stand out in his record is that which provided vocational training for soldiers, so ably promoted by Senator France, the first one upon the floor of the Senate so to do. It may not be generally known that the great Public Health Service Soldiers' Hospital at Perryville was made possible by Senator France, who learned that the Government plant, which cost eighteen millions of dollars, was going to be scrapped for one million, eight hundred thousand. It was his foresight, his technical knowledge as a physician, his breadth of imagination, that saved the plant at Perryville, and converted it into one of the most important hospitals in the country.

Senator France's stand for free speech in accord with Constitutional guarantees, although he himself was opposed to the blatant vociferations of foes of American institutions, has found full indorsement in the attitude since assumed by the Government itself. But the senior Maryland Senator was concerned not only for free expression, but for economical administration of the government, so that the people might have fuller pride in it.

He was one of the first to propose a national budget system. He was the first in the Senate, if not in Congress, to see the necessity for reorganization of the executive departments, which culminated in a commission to promote this end.

Perceiving that the Esch-Cummins law for the restoration of the railroads to private management would bring about the very railroad problems that now confront the country, he courageously voted against it.

Believing also that unemployment is a basic economic consequence of controllable conditions, Senator France, in 1919, urged measures directed against this condition of distress in the nation.

That historic filibuster of 1919 is a long story that can be told very shortly. Senator France featured in it because he saw the need of an extra session of Congress for reconstruction legislation. Through his efforts at that extra session, nine hundred million dollars was cut from the appropriation bills as they had been prepared and proposed by the Democratic controlled Congress.

Senator France was the first one in Congress to propose a measure to bring about an association of the nations. To him is due, and to Maryland the credit, for this initiative. But against the Wilson League of Nations Senator France stood as an irreconcilable. He was unwilling to see this free Republic enter into an alliance with the empires of Europe and thus to make our country a party to all their endless contentions and strife. Has he been justified? Look abroad at Europe today, and let the history of the past few years give an answer. Yet there is no man in America more sincerely devoted to aiding Europe or who has proposed more wide-reaching measures to this end than Senator France.

To revive Europe and stimulate America, he has advocated before trade bodies the country over, plans for world trade resuscitation. It will be recalled in this connection that in 1920 he advocated opening trade relations with Russia and to relieve the starving millions of that country. He saw England going into Russia where America ought to be, and, opposed to socialism and bolshevism, he has advocated rational economic relations with that country. He stands for America's good and Russia's succor.

Where, in all romance; where, in the story of heroic quests, is there anything to outshine Senator France's penetration of Russia, the land of mystery, girt about by hostile powers and bitterly resentful? He desired to crush the untruthful propaganda that was keeping Russia and America from an understanding, and such co-operation as was to be desired. In a Russian prison was an American woman, awaiting rescue. Senator France did much to accomplish one object of his mission, and fully achieved the other. Despite stories to the contrary, he never recommended a loan to Russia—not one dollar. He believed that if he could persuade the Russians to adopt sound systems of government that we could then recognize them and allow them to borrow in the money markets of the world like other governments, what they might need.

Time would fail to recite all the claims of Senator France to be known as Maryland's great constructive statesman. His fellow-Marylanders know his services, his statesmanship, and the sacred trust he has held for them. They will give to him the indorsement provided by Republican institutions in the form of the freeman's ballot.

VIOLATORS OF LIVE STOCK LAWS MUST PAY FINES

For violation of regulatory laws recently imposed in 43 cases, as announced by the Bureau of Animal Industry, in its service and regulatory announcements for July. The list of violators includes railway and express companies, meat dealers and live stock owners. Most of the violations were of the quarantine law which restricts the interstate shipment of diseased, ticky, or uninspected stock. Several live stock owners encountered the federal law when attempting to drive or ship tuberculous cattle interstate.

Violations of the meat inspection law included the offering of unsound meat, shipping uninspected meat and lard, and in one case, using a wrapper for wrapping uninspected meat. The majority of fines range from $25 to $200. Although the federal laws and regulations relating to live stock are for the most part well understood and complied with, persons unfamiliar with the regulations and with the importance of preventing interstate stipment of diseased animals and unsound meats may obtain copies of regulations by applying to the department.
