THE VERMONT ELECTION

Political leaders who have permitted themselves to be deceived by the nullificationists' clamor that there is a reversal of public sentiment in favor of modificaton of the Volstead law, would do well to study the returns of the Vermont primary election of last Tuesday. The dry law enforcement issue was fought out in the Republican primary in which a candidate for United States Senator and a candidate for Representative in Congress from the second district were nominated. There was no contest in the Democratic primary.

Of the four Republicans seeking nomination for United States Senator, one stood for strict law enforcement and the maintenance of the Volstead law. One was for modification of the Volstead act in favor of beer and wine, another favored relaxing the regulations governing medicinal liquor, while the fourth ignored the dry law enforcement issue altogether.

The pronounced dry, Col. Porter H. Dale, won a decisive victory, securing more votes than the combined votes of his two wet opponents.

This election was a fair test of public sentiment because the recognized paramount issue was dry law enforcement and each of the candidates had conducted an extensive campaign.

The successful candidate in the Republican congressional primary was also a dry, favoring strict enforcement of the Volstead law.

Friends of prohibition and its enforcement are greatly encouraged over the result of the Vermont elections. It is a sure index of public sentiment on the issue of prohibition and its enforcement and a thousand times more convincing than the fake straw votes that are being taken by the various wet organizations throughout the country.—American Issue.
