MEMORY CALLS IT ALL SOULS' DAY

To Hindus and Japanese it is the Festival of the Dead. Everywhere one finds sacrifice and prayer for the repose of those departed—the restless dead. For so the living heart believed them when it could not cease to grieve. The restless dead—the child who never lived to play, the genius who slept on the eve of fame, the soldier fallen with victory and peace just in sight, the millions who died with kind deeds not done. On such a night as Hallowe'en come shadowy images, faces of dead playmates, their very form and presence hinted in the rustle of the autumn leaves. In warmer climes than ours the brush of foliage on your face in passing by seems soft and sweet as hands of children reaching out. In every home on All Souls' Eve some one listens for footsteps coming up the path, for the creak of an empty rocking chair. How real seem then the remembered hands, unforgotten eyes, a familiar turn of gesture or of speech. Perhaps on that night of souls the old earth, like our memories, stirs with the restless departed ones, life itself quickened by the living dead.—Colliers.

"THAT THINE OWN RIGHT HAND CAN SAVE"

Five small fingers that cling to one of yours when the way home is long. That go softly groping for your watch to find where the tick comes from, or into any pocket to see what's there. Not much use for buttoning the owner's clothes or managing a spoon at meal times. Not very clean either unless mother has had a look at 'em lately. Not much of anything at all, in fact—just five small fingers. And yet, they will hold a man to his work when nothing else will, when the job is a tiring nuisance, and ambition foolishness, and the world a mess of grimy dust. No lawyer ever drew a contract that gripped like the trust of a tiny hand laid in yours. No orator, no musician of them all, ever hammered out a phrase that meant as much as "Father's come home." "Hostages to fortune," said the old philosopher Bacon. Bacon was a fool that time. Fortune herself is a hostage to the heart that holds the fadless memory of five small fingers close within your own.

What Can We Do?

Mr. Editor:

When women were given the franchise, great things were expected of them. They were to reform the old parties, inaugurate new ideals, boost the schools, kill the rum business, and make many other changes that the men, poor cowards, were afraid to tackle. The rum business is feeling their influence, and the schools perhaps, but are they not letting golden opportunities pass, by falling into the same partisan spirit that has ruined the usefulness of the men? So much could be accomplished if they would become interested in the good of the community, instead of the success of a party. The women of Caroline can elect any man or set of men they desire, and if they would stand for the right, no candidate would dare to advocate anything not for the best interests of the community. The candidates will not announce themselves as favoring this or that improvement, or whether they are wet or dry, for fear of losing the men's votes, and yet the women can elect or reject any one of them by their ballots.

"Vote as your conscience dictates" is an old saying, but how easily the conscience can be made to approve a vote for our party! There are good men on both tickets. There are wet and dry. Is a man who will oppose needed school improvements a good citizen? Is a wet candidate, who would not remove the last vestige of temptation from the path of our boys a good citizen? Have we picked the best candidates, or will we on election day simply vote for party, like the poor men, and be perfectly satisfied with the results? How many women are bigger and broader than this? The vote of next Tusday will surely show.

To the editor of the American Union:

I would like to ask Mr. Wesley E. Thawley through your columns, the following question:

In re to your circular letter to voters please allow me to ask—Is the fact that a man finds it hard to succeed in his chosen profession any reason why he should be chosen for public office?
