At Home and Abroad

ONE BEAR AND I

One bear and I parted as perfectly good friends, but it was the other Bear that made my hair stand up straight. I had never had the pleasure of meeting a bear face to face out in the wilds until last winter.

But that doesn't include "bear stories" I had been hearing all along, bigger and better the further North I came. The folks at the lumber camps delighted in telling the most blood curdling bear stories just before I left to go down to my camp. Sometimes I couldn't help but think of them and if I thought long enough I could see just "oodles" of them peeping at me from all sides. One evening, one of the "Cancuck" lumberjacks made the remark that when you see a bear all you have to do is to stand still and clap your hands and the bear will run away. On my way to camp I was wondering what I really would do if I saw a bear, but I hadn't had time to wonder long when one of them appeared almost beside me—I believe my hair stood up its full length, my feet bounded away and before I took time to think I had leaped over brush piles and landed on the other side of a log in the most ungraceful fashion. But that was only the beginning of my flight—when I heard the bear somewheres near where I had deposited myself I clapped my hands loudly to try out the advice of the "Canuck" and sure enough the bear moved—but towards me—not rapidly, but slowly, very slowly indeed, but to me it seemed as tho she were coming towards me at high speed. With a wild dash I made for the direction of camp, disregarded my tent, dashed for the [illegible] of a log shack, pulled what [illegible] of a door between myself [illegible] outside and spent the rest of [illegible] about bears chas- [illegible] creation.

But the bear story—it's a peach! One time one of the boys kept bringing in suspiciously many bearskins. We folks all asked him "how come" and he just replied as coolly as can be that he had a trained bear on which he went out hunting and who took him round to all the bear "hangouts". Of course we didn't believe this but Bud said he'd show us the bear if we wanted to see it—and of course we couldn't wait until we set eyes on him.

So the next morning we all went down to his camp with him and there, sure enough, he had a great big black bear tied to a tree. When he was ready Bud just simply climbed on the bear's back, said "giddap" and believe me, that bear started off just as nice and quiet like, just as good and gentle as the best horse there ever was. Well, we all up and went with him to see the hunting. We had gone a long ways and about given up seeing that bear hunt bear, when all of a sudden there were four bears all just agrowling and aclawing and apatting away for dear life, Bud and his bear all mixed up with 'em. The boys and myself all took to the trees, of course. For a while things looked pretty bad for Bud, his clothes were all torn, his face and hands scratched and all his shooting and banging away on those bears didn't seem to do a bit of good, but by and by he had killed the four bears and was getting ready to ride home on his own when the beast reared up, slapped him and tumbled him over and over a[illegible]ver. But and we all thought that se[illegible] other bears must have made his pet bear kind of crazy, but Bud [illegible] after a while, and we fol[illegible]ning him rear and gnash [illegible] and try to get ahold of [illegible] we reached the camp Bu[illegible] t[illegible] bear chained and him still a[illegible] and rearing and Bud walked up to us kind of easy like and says "Boys, I rode the wrong bear."

IRON FALSE TEETH. WAR AND CRIME DOESN'T PAY. YOUTH AND LAWLESSNESS. SOME CAN'T WEAR 'EM.

The great Krupp concern, makers of big cannon on which the Kaiser's power used to rest, now manufactures false teeth of steel, enameled, the same steel that once went into fighting machinery.

Can you imagine anything stranger in history than the possibility of the Kaiser wearing a set of false teeth made by the Krupps? Not the same bite in that set as there was in the old cannon.

Two things never pay—crime and war. The big war cost two hundred and fifty billions of dollars, besides lives lost. The Chicago crime that attracts attention will cost at least $600,000. It's expensive, even for taxpayers. They will supply about $100,000 as their share.

The parents of the depraved youths that murdered young Franks will spend about $500,000.

That is the price of two young men's attempt to get $10,000 by kidnaping. Their two necks may be added to the total.

A Hollander is on his way to Marseilles, a distance of 700 miles. To win a bet he must travel all the way turning somersaults. Starting in November, 1923, he has until next February 12 to finish the trip. About two million somersaults will cover the distance. The man is well padded, and seems quite happy, like many that think as he travels, also in somersaults.

Italy doesn't know what to do with her wine crop this year. She has not enough casks to hold it. Citizens can walk into a wine cellar and "drink as much as desired" for a few cents.

Good prohibitionists will say, "What terrible drunkenness there will be in Italy." But they don't know the Italian people. They don't get drunk, whether the wine is cheap or dear.

Judge Talley says, "The United States is the most lawless nation, and most criminals are youngsters."

That's just it. The United States is a youngster. Youth is always lawless. Lawlessness is terrible, but there is one worse thing, and that is stagnation.

Parts of the West that were once most lawless in the old gold fever days are now typically law abiding. This country will settle down. "There is a cure for exuberance, none for sterility."

Disease is one of earth's mysteries. And most mysterious is the trouble that Nature takes to protect disease germs against their enemies, including man.

For instance, the tubercular bacillus, which kills millions, lives encased in "a heavy capsule of fat," which gives it elasticity and protects it from its enemies in our blood.

Sir Leonard Rogers, who has specialized in fighting leprosy, noticed the resemblance between the germs of leprosy and of tuberculosis, and tried on his consumptive patients injections of sodium morrhuate, that worked well in leprosy.

It is the salt obtained from the body of codfish, and has shown extraordinary results in leprosy and tuberculosis.

Knickerbockers are sensible, worn at the right time, but they are not for every female figure.

In the North you see hundreds of young women in knickerbockers that remind you of the stone wall built by the honest farmer, "Three feet high, three feet wide," so that if it blows over it will be just the same. Some young ladies in knickerbockers would look about the same if they blew over. But why fine the poor creatures? Many are fining themselves to the value of one husband.

A woman, eighty, bobs her hair, partly because she is tired of hearing young people of fifty and sixty talking about it. Some of the youngsters consider an eighty-year-old "boyish bob" amusing. But many a woman of eighty is literally younger than the worn-out flapper of eighteen or thirty-eight. It's the youth in the eyes, not in the years, that counts.

Poem

by Uncle John

I may be called a "greenhorn" in my manners or my gait —and, my gineral line of conduct may be fur from up-to-date . . . I may not know the password where they draw the line on hicks—but, dern my cats I've got no use fer dirty politics!

I've allers stood fer principles my conscience said was good, and have struggled to uphold 'em right along, the best I could, —And, if my nearest neighbors never find me dodgin' bricks, it's because I've helt myself aloof from dirty politics!

It's fair to jedge a feller by the company he keeps, with a heart-an-hand dependence on the Eye that never sleeps,—And while my stern advisements may be clumsy or prolix, I'd warn my friends from mixin' up with dirty politics!
