The Ideal Home Is AHappy Home

What is your ideal for your home? Chances are, you have certain ideals when it comes to its furnishings. But what about family harmony?

As you busy yourself with spring house cleaning and getting your house in order for the warmer days ahead, take stock of the heart of your home—the family within it.

According to Mrs. Jeanne Moehn family life specialist, University of Maryland Extension Service, you can have an ideally furnished home but it takes more than that to make it a happy home.

The specialist points out that in the ideal home the necessary work to maintain it is done by those who share the home. Work is divided according to each family member's ability.

Sharing these activities helps those who take part to develop spiritually, to contribute toward building a happy home. The home should be interested in each member as an individual, says Mrs. Moehn. This doesn't mean just "what I want," nor does it mean just "what you want", but what will work best for all concerned.

Mrs. Moehn points out some factors which lead to happier living for the entire group.

Remember to show appreciation of other members of the family. A spark of appreciation goes a long way in encouraging a person to share family activities.

For complete happiness, a husband must appreciate the work of the homemaker and the contribution she can make to the family's living. The wife in turn must appreciate her husband's work and encourage him in it.

Husband and wife should also appreciate the contributions their children make. Be careful to allow the children an opportunity to make contributions within their abilities.

Little Susie may not do a job as well as you can, but just by tryng, she feels that she has a part in the operation of the home.
