Farm People And Price Supports

What do typical farm people think about price supports? Do they want high supports, flexible supports, or no support at all?

The Michigan Farmer, published in East Lansing, decided to obtain an answer. It engaged an independent agency to make personal calls on farm families in 16 Michigan counties. Here's what the agency reported:

Only 14.4 percent of the men and 13.5 per cent of the women favored high supports; 38.5 per cent of the men and 4.3 per cent of the women were for flexible supports; 41.3 per cent of the men and 33.7 per cent of the women were against supports of any kind; 5.8 per cent of the men and 12.5 per cent of the women had no opinion.

This certainly indicates that agriculture's attitude toward support is changing. There's good reason why that should be. For one thing, it's axiomatic that when government subsidizes any enterprise in any manner it does more and more bossing—and the recipients of the subsidies enjoy less and less independence. And it's certainly obvious that we can't forever use tax money to purchase incredible surpluses that strain the nation's storage facilities to the bursting point.

In this connection, beef producers are presenting us with a fine example today. The supply of beef is huge—but producers aren't asking for supports or other governmental financial aid. Instead they are carrying on an intensive, nation-wide marketing campaign, in cooperation with other interested agencies, designed to show the housewife that beef is a good buy and to encourage her to use more of it. In other words ,they want their production to go into the homes of consumers—not in to storage. That is the only sound solution to any such farm problem.

Invitation to Tyranny

For a generation the people of the U.S. have watched the building up of a centralized federal government that now reaches into every corner of their homes and businesses.

As a result total taxes have increased until for the average family they are now larger than the grocery bill.

Only the people can break the stranglehold of a federal bureaucracy by turning back to local government for their local needs instead of seeking federal hand-outs.

There is hope for the future when a high federal office holder stresses the importance of local self-government, as did Senator Cordon of Oregon, who said recently: "Too much centralization of government can make the nation more volunerable to Communist influence and is an invitation to tyranny, dictatorship ad finally slavery.

"We have come mighty close to that in the last 20 years. We saw far too much power exported to Washington. We saw bureau piled on bureau, administrator added to administrator, control added to control.

"As a result of that piling up of power in Washington, we saw the Communists, by every devious and sly means, creep into government in high places, and we saw our most jealously guarded secrets in atomic energy handed over to Ruussia.
