Salt Is the Culprit, Says Manager of Operation

"The fact that Hurricane Hazel was a big blow with comparatively little rain as it passed over this pen insula undoubtedly added to our recent difficulties," comments Ned Mortimer, Manager of Operations, for Eastern Shore Public Service in explaining the unavoidable shutdown of the main generating plant at Vienna Friday, Oct. 15.

When the 100-mile-per-hour wind lashed the tidewaters of the eastern seaboard, the air was filled with salt spray. The salty moisture became so dense that it coated the insulators on the high tension lines at the Vienna Substation.

Since salt water is an excellent conductor of electricity ,the high voltage current "arc-ed" across the insulators. Plant employees could see the flashes and hear the crackle above the roar of the storm.

Insulators serve to support electric conductors and keep the flow of current where it belongs. But, when salt spray covered the insulators, a false path was provided for the current to flow to the earth. This short circuiting automatically brought the relays—silent sentinels of the electric business—into action, and shut off the current in the trans mission lines.

"Many people probably have seen evidence of this saltiness on their own window panes which faced the gale," said Mr .Mortimer, as he explained this almost unheard-of cause of service stoppage. "The remedy necessary for the disastrous salt spray was a good washing with fresh water."

Paying tribute to the volunteer firemen, he continued, "The firemen at Vienna came forward and volunteered to wash the insulators with their fire hoses so that production and transmission of power could be resumed.

"Of course, Hurricane Hazel deposited salt spray over thousands more insulators on our system. In various communities we rae indebted to the generosity of fire departments which brought man-power and equipment to our aid.

"This salt deposit condition which causes short circuiting may possibly occur in some places in the system until the Eastern Shore gets a driving rain to wash it all away. Your own television antenna, somewhat similarly affected by salt spray, pro bably will give better results after it has been well washed by a driving rain."
