SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1906.

The New York building department has granted a permit for a 42-story building. The top of it will do very nicely for a landing place for flying machines a few years from now.

In future any man or set of men found packing refuse for food ought to be condemned to an imprisonment which will include the serving of their own canned products for their daily food. So would the punishment be made to fit the crime.

According to the testimony in the Florida ice investigation, ice produced at a cost of $2.60 a ton was sold to housekeepers for $18 a ton. Nothing further is needed to show where the old query, "Wouldn't you like to be the ice man?" started.

An epidemic has broken out among the schoolteachers in Philadelphia which is depleting their ranks and against which the authorities are powerless, though it seems to be both contagious and infectious. It is caused by the matrimonial bacillus, and any inoculation only appears to make the disease more virulent. The only way of treating it is simply to let it run its course and to get immunes, as far as possible, to supply the place of the eighty-odd victims of the epidemic.

Now St. Louis is after the ice companies. The movement is spreading with all the force of an epidemic, the price and the warm waves helping immensely to make the crusade popular. And in the general movement against trusts there is something which appeals to primitive instincts with all the zest and excitement of a bear-baiting. Of course, the ice companies themselves are not enjoying the situation, but they have had the laugh so long on the public that they cannot complain of not having had a square deal.

A North Carolina grand jury has indicted lynchers for murder in the first degree. When convictions and executions for lynching as merely a form of murder are secured, then, and not until then, will the lawless taking of life, which has disgraced many communities, be broken up. If the law fails to protect life and person anywhere the fault is with those having charge of the enforcement of the law, and it is to this direction that outraged citizens are to look, as the appointment of the officers of the law lies mainly with the community at large. Lynching is, by its very nature, a confession of failure, not of the law, but of its enforcement and of the respect felt for it.

The summer vacation should not be considered as an indulgence, but as a necessity according to an exchange. It is the required relaxation of the tired human mind and body. It is an investment in good health, an insurance against collapse, a tonic to support the system during the remainder of the year. Viewed in this light, the selection of a vacation place should be carefully made with reference to its quality. The man who has for 10 or 11 months been hustling around the city, communicating daily and hourly with other men about business, touching elbows with humanity at every turn and never getting out of reach of the forces that make the world whirl, should try to change his conditions and find a place of comparative isolation, where he comes in contact with the ground and sees the trees and the waters and the rocks, and can, if he desires, become a hermit for a few weeks. Change is the great requisite, and change means not merely a shifting of the latitude and longitude, but a transformation of all the conditions—social, physicial, atmospheric. The farmer is more benefited in his vacation-making by a visit to the city than by rest on the farm. The city man should conversely seek the rural regions, where everything is strange to him. In short, vacation should be construed as transformation, and not merely an exchange of one crowd for another. It is possible to waste the vacation time by excessive physical labors or by indulging in social diversions which sorely tax the nerves and strength. A week in the woods will often restore a man's balance better than a fortnight at a crowded resort where there are obligation of dress and deportment. It is, after all, however, largely a matter of disposition.

The tailors of London don't like Bryan's coat. It may be it is the best the poor man can do. He says that Roosevelt is wearing all his clothes.

A Kansas City iceman testifies that he went into business with $600 and the following season made $45,000. Evidently, the Toledo fellows wanted to beat this record.

If John D. Rockefeller writes a book, as is threatened, he should make it an autobiography. It would be a great satisfaction to him to have history say something pleasant about him; even if he has to write it himself.

Lightning in Connecticut dug up a whole furrow of potatoes. The freaks in which lightning is indulging this season is intensifying interest in knowing where it is going to strike when it gets down to the real business of the campaign.

A man from Chicago is in Washington trying to get the Supreme Court to overrule the decision of a judge that took him out of the penitentiary. He thinks he ought to be in the penitentiary and is doing his best to get back there. Naturally, everyone will conclude that he is crazy; so impersonal and keen a sense of justice and of the punishment of crime is too preternatural not to be under suspicion as to its sanity.

The summer of 1906 will be noted for its local storms. This is perhaps not so striking to persons unless they keep in touch with the different local neighborhoods of the county. This office frequently records washing rains and damages by lightning in certain parts of the county, while at the same time, elsewhere within our borders picnics and other outdoor occurences are going on. The number of general rains in the county have been very few, and since the drouth in May vegetation has been moistened almost entirely by local showers.

Crop Conditions.

We have received information from different sections of the peninsula, that in many places corn crops have been abandoned on account of the inability of the farmers to till the crop in time to save it. While there are indications that the tomato crop will be very good in some sections, there are others sections in which there will be practically no crop at all. About the time when plants were getting of some size there was a heavy frost which killed many, then after the plants were put out the worms got into them and ruined many patches; then came the heavy rains, by reason of which many patches were drowned out, while others became so grassy as to be beyond cleaning up so that the whole was left to grow up or else was plowed up and set out in later plants.

While the above conditions exist in many places, there are other sections where crops are in splendid condition. Tomatoes look very promising and corn is higher than one's head and tasseling out, and there are indications that while this has been an unusually wet season, full crops may be made. But all of this is a part of the chances taken in farming, and on the whole when the crops are averaged up, year in year out, it will be found that Queen Anne's is up to the averages with all the others.
