One of the learned scientists says that man is made of soap. Perhaps that is why he so often cleans out the treasury when he gets into office.

It would be pretty rough on us if the ice freezes so hard and thick this winter that the companies can't cut it, and thus there is another scarcity next summer.

"Are you a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor?" This question was Wednesday put to Gen. Murray Vandiver, chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee and state treasurer, and was prompted by a report that several Democratic leaders in the counties had tendered him their support. "I am not unwilling to be a candidate," replied General Vandiver slowly. "I have no hesitancy in saying that the governorship of Maryland is an honor which should gratify the ambition of any man. Whether I shall or shall not receive the nomination I do not know. The state convention is six months off, and the situation has not sufficiently developed to enable any man to foresee the outcome. I am assured of the support of many influential Democrats." "Yes," continued the Democratic chairman and state treasurer, "I am not unwilling to be a candidate."

To be carried down from the third floor into the ruins of a burning warehouse and to remain twenty-six hours under hundreds of tons of debris, and yet to come out alive and cheerful, is the astonishing record made by Fireman John J. Seufert of New York. Of course, he had extraordinary good fortune; but as in the case of the buried California miner, whose rescue was the most memorable event of Christmas Eve, his own stout heart was a mighty factor in the struggle for life. "I'm cold and clammy, and I'd like a ball," were the first words that came from him when the rescuers were near enough to exchange greetings. A touching episode occurred when Father Smith, one of the chaplains of the Fire Department, administered the consolations of the Church to the buried fireman. He was quite cheery, and carried on his part of the absolution service with manly composure. At the conclusion, when the priest said "Now cheer up and trust in God," the reply came strong and prompt, "Very well, Father." The man who can cheer up and trust in God has a principle of safety that will carry him through the most desperate emergencies.

At the Jackson Day banquet and celebration at the Concord Club in Baltimore on Tuesday night State Senator Arthur P. Gorman, of Howard county, who is a member of the club, hit Governor Warfield hard, though he did not mention him by name. The inference from his remarks was, however, so plain that there could be no mistaking that he was making an onslaught upon the Governor, whom he berated because of his attitude on the Poe disfranchising amendment.

After Senator Gorman had dwelt at length upon the character, achievements and Democratic principles which guided President Andrew Jackson throughout life he shot his thrusts at Governor Warfield.

"In this state of ours," said Mr. Gorman, "we have not always followed the sound and safe politics which guided Andrew Jackson. We have not always found Democrats true who should have been true to the party which elected them and true to its principles. In recent years we have witnessed the sad spectacle of a man, elected as a Democrat, who failed to do what he was elected to do. (Referring to Governor Warfield.)

"By the aid of the press the state was turned over to the Republican party. In 1899 the Democrats won back the state.

"Have these newspapers stopped their abuse? They hold up, or, at least try to hold up the Democratic organization of this city to scorn and condemnation. Is not this the condition? Is not your city among the foremost in the land? Is not its credit of the highest character? All this has been brought about under Democratic rule, despite the contemptible charges that the Democratic party organization is corrupt. If the Democratic organization of this city has nominated a corrupt man for office, let this independent newspaper point him out."

Delaware presents the two extreme examples of a man who can have the United States Senatorship for the asking and yet will not accept it, and another man who is willing to pay millions for it and yet cannot buy it.

The Paris court that decided that a woman must be reasonable in her expenditure for dresses did not stop to reflect that to be unreasonable is the dearest privilege of the so-called fair sex. In this country such a decision would be a violation of the constitutional right to the pursuit of happiness.

Fires, wrecks on land and sea and epidemics have marked the beginning of the new year. Destiny certainly seems to be after humanity just now with a big stick. Or it may be that events are shaping themselves to show an unsuspected amount of human agency in the big disasters of the world.

Justice Gaynor of New York is a reformer of the ebullient type, from whom brilliant ideas are apt to gush at any time. His latest notion is that the Government can solve the transportation problem by appointing the general freight agent of every railroad. As life is worth more than freight, it seems to be a strange omission that he does not also arrange, while he is about it, to have the Government appoint the block signal operators.

Mrs. Carrie Nation, the fearless assailant of men smokers and the human battering ram of saloons, met her Waterloo ingloriously in Washington at the hands of that creature, destitute of fear or reverence for anything or anybody, the small boy. She had to be rescued from her small tormentors by policemen and to beat a hasty retreat. There are latent possibilities, after all, in the small boy.

Society women in a Connecticut town are going to try the "silence cure" for their nerves, and have resolved to stop talking. The strain on their nerves by this unnatural restriction, however, is apt to make the remedy prove worse than the disease, and the woman—there will scarcely be more than one—who emerges from the ordeal with her resolution kept will be the heroine of the age. In the meantime the masculine portion of the town is pluming itself on the coming temporary millennium.
