FOR THE STAR.

IMPORTANT!!!

THE Arch-Duke Charles having heard of the expedition with which Bonaparte repaired the bridges on the Danube, formed his army for a retrograde movement, but lacking instructions from the Duke of York, he was unable to retreat with more than ordinary swiftness. The French eagles reiterated at the late affair of Esling, felt their wings nerved with more than common energy, and with a double thirst for victory pursued ——when on the borders of Selicia, they overtook the arch-duke, whose retreat had been just stopped by the Russians. "O! wretched Fate!" Exclaimed those recently victorious troops,"—we conquered the conqueror, 'tis true; but our laurels wither in the consideration "that he had no means of defence. His ammunition exhausted, and his means of attack out of reach. Now we shall feel the severe lashes of his revenge, and shall soon be possessed by him, over whom we lately triumphed!"—Pressed on their rear by the French, and received on their front by the Russians, they were at once unable to make any resistance; a capitulation ensued, in which it was determined that the arch-duke and his army should be prisoners of war. He was immediately sent to Paris, where he is amusing himself with the rest of the fraternity.

John has been driven from the city of Rab. Hungary was not formed to secure to John a safe retreat, for a discovery of his situation was soon made, and he was as soon forced to surrender. He, it seems, is likewise at Paris, holding converse with some of the ex-kings.

Murat, king of Naples prepared a flotilla, on which he went to Sicily, and there by particularly grand movements, obtained a speedy possession. He is now in possession of Palermo, while the king has taken refuge in Malta.

Wellesley next in turn, has met with wretched fate!——For at night, and at midnight too, when all was hush & quiet; when pleasing dreams of victory tickled the imagination of this sleeping general —the dread alarm was given! Trumpets and drums, and all the horrid din of war burst like tenfold thunder upon this hero and his army. To arms! to arms! resounded throughout the camp —while the dismal gloom of the dark night was made more gloomy by frequent flashes of thick flame, and then followed by—

"Arm warriors! Arm for fight!"——
. . . . . "Then stormy fury rose,
And clamour, such as heard on Earth 'til now,
Was never"—— . . . . . .

Astonished Wellesley stood, and his fierce troops now panic struck, with bendled hair, and staring eyes, beheld the ghost of Soult—Sometimes in air he'd order the battle, when in a moment from his station there, he'd order on the ground—

"Vanguard to right and left, the front unfold,
That all may see who hate us"——

When in a moment "in a flame, but soon obscured, all Heaven appeared."—Retreat! Retreat! was sounded, and round they wheeled—but quick as thought, the disembodied Soult came full in front, and with ten thousand hosts his ministers of war—played off their dreadful engines!

"War seemed a civil game to this usurper."
. . . . . Soult beheld their flight,
And to his mates thus in derision called:
O friends why come not on there victors proud?
. . . . . when we
To entertain them fair with open front,
. . . . . propounded terms
Of composition.—straight they changed their minds,
Flew off, and into strange ragaries fell,
As they would dance ——

Universal consternation put a stop to Soult's deriding—for down the army fell —all save Wellesley, who made his best way to an air balloon prepared for great emergency——In it he crept: It rose, and towards the unpolluted island of Britain, he shaped his course:—But while sailing on, a French drummer espied the conveyance, and with good aim let fly both drum-sticks, perforated the balloon, and let the general down into the water near the Figuese, where there lay one of his majesty's ships, by which he was saved. The army were made prisoners to Soult, save those who died with fear.

A formal account of those wretchedly deplorable circumstances were immediately transmitted to the Court of
