NEWSPAPERS.

"You lie—you circulate nothing but lies," says the world very civilly to the Printers; "newspapers are the very oracles of falsehood"—

With your leave, sirs, we will put in one word, in their favour——Tis true, that they circulate many errors, or, if you please to call them so lies—and many of them are not even to blame for this; for such as they receive from others, they give unto you.—But, Sirs, it is equally true, that newspapers limit the range of error—they prevent, in an inconceivable degree, the circulation of more lies, than they throw into the stream of circulation. We make it out thus:

If there were no newspapers, reports would fly on the wings of tradition; we say, that they would pass from hand to hand, or rather from mouth to mouth. A vessel arrives at New York, with a large body of foreign news from London—it flies from the passengers to the merchant, from him to the Inn Keeper, from him to others, until the mail passengers convey it to the South.——In this circuitous passage, what mistakes, what misunderstandings, what alterations, additions, and perversions take place!!—until at length the echo in no respect resembles the original report——Let the press now arise in N York and what a change of things immediately takes place. This foreign intelligence is at once fixed—embodied——stampt in black and white, in such a permanent form as neither invites nor permits perversion. It come to us, in a straight line, without change, without addition, without distortion. Those hosts of lies which were conjured up by oral communication, are now laid asleep—and, the much abused newspapers become the friends of truth, and the enemies of misrepresentation.

But what apology does this supply to those lying printers, who "make the very meat they feed on;" who invent as well as circulate lies; who do all they can to mislead the public mind; & palm upon us French Despatches that were never written, and French Treaties that were never conceived! Those Munchausens of the press are not despised alone—Their sins are visited upon others, for the misconduct of a few becomes the reproach of the whole corps——"Whip me such rascals naked thro' the world."
