COAL PALACE.

Jet Black Structure at Jamestown Exposition—Striking Contrasts.

Almost every known mineral can be found in the Virginia hills. The Apallachian range of mountains, which is somewhat of a freak geologically, is in no way more curious than in the diversity of its stores.

Most of the metals occur in commercial quantities, of others there are only slight traces, but of all workable mines, none offers such a certainty of return as a well placed coal property.

Virginia has taken occasion at the Jamestown Exposition to exhibit her mineral wealth and to show samples of a multitude of ores. It has been resolved by the Jamestown Exposition to have a mammoth display of the mineral which is perhaps the greatest wealth producer of the State.

Architecturally the Jamestown Exposition will be a Colonial affair of red brick, with white columns and white ornaments.

In contrast with these colors an immense jet black structure will stand out to memoralize Old King Coal.

At first thought, a house built of coal, might appear hazardous to cleanliness, but on the contrary it is the impalpable coal dust which soils, and if this is removed coal can be handled with impunity.

In order, however, to prevent any possibility of dirt, the coal forming the palace will be shellaced and coal takes a varnish easily and holds it. It can be polished until it reflects almost like glass and the varnish makes the polish permanent.

Some of the mines in Virginia have seams fourteen to sixteen feet thick, and solid, upright columns of not less than fourteen feet could easily be made from the mineral in the Imboden vein.

Coal cut vertically will bear great weight, and these columns would be as safe as granite. There are many kinds of coal in Virginia, ranging from very hard anthracite through the semi-bituminous and bituminous grades almost to lignites.

These varieties are not only different in degrees of hardness, but very largely in color, so that a house built of coal taken from Virginia's mines and carefully selected, will be not only interesting as a commercial exhibit, but very attractive to those who look upon coal merely as coal and know nothing of its characteristics.
