Seven States Joined "Drys"

Seven more States took their place in the prohibition column when the New Year come in, swelling the total to eighteen. They are Arkansas, Washington, Idaho, Iowa, Colorado, South Carolina and Oregon.

The eleven States previously dry are: Maine, Kansas, Tennessee, Mississippi, Arizona, North Carolina, West Virginia, Georgia, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Alabama.

Virginia will become dry November 1, 1916

About five million persons will come under statewide prohibition laws. It has been reckoned that $100,000,000 capital invested in the liquor industry will disappear so far as its previous use is concerned, although it will not be a total loss.

Four states—New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Nevada and Montana are "wet" virtually throughout. This leaves twenty-five local option States, most of which have rural prohibition and license cities.

In the six States—Vermont, Michigan, South Dakota, Nebraska, Montana and California—will put the question of ousting demon rum before the voters. Florida will also probably ballot on prohibition. Most of the Southern States are now in the no-drink class. And may Maryland be there shortly.

Eat Many Onions And Live Long.

For a quarter of a century a Frederick resident has been eating onions. Rarely has a day passed without this person having devoured one of the vegetables of the onion variety. "Eat onions," enthusiastically urged this man, "and you will be a long-liver." In other words so firmly does he believe in the medicinal qualities of the vegetable that he would increase the average life of mankind, say from ten to twenty years, by making the world onion-eaters. This man eats them like apples, and cooked in all imaginable ways. Then he has concocted what is to him a delightful combination, an onion sandwich. He also carries them about in his pocket, so that he might never be without them. He likes onions in just the same manner the cigarette fiend craves his "dope."
