OUR POULTRY DEPARTMENT

ITEMS OF INTEREST TO OUR KENT COUNTY CHICKEN RAISERS GATHERED HERE AND THERE

Brooding Big Flocks.—One of the chief factors limiting the development of the poultry industry as a whole, or the poultry enterprise on any farm, is the difficulty of raising chicks. Other operations connected with poultry keeping can be reduced to definite systems and be carried on with machine like precision. The great commercial hatcheries turn out thousands of baby chicks on definite schedule. Unskilled labor in the feeding stations fatten market poultry in wholesale lots. The only limitation to the size of the modern laying plant is the number of well developed pullets which can be secured. But chick raising always has been and continues to be a task which requires intelligent care to insure success. Any person who has good results in raising chicks can succeed in the poultry business if he will observe a few common sense rules for carrying on the other operations. Probably ninety per cent of the failures on poultry plants come from an inability to raise sufficient chicks to keep the flock up to a maximum number. Some claim that chicks must be brooded in relatively small flocks, where they can receive individual attention. Results have proven, however, that large flocks can be raised under the proper conditions. A flock of chicks must have access to the soil. Chicks will not stand overcrowding, we know by experience. These facts prevent chick raising from being carried on in the same intensive way as hatching, fattening and commercial egg production. The introduction of modern methods has, however, eliminated considerable of the uncertainty which was attached to the old methods of brooding and will allow a greater expansion of the poultry industry. Brooding methods have been slower to develop than other phases of poultry keeping, and modern practices are eliminating many of the causes of chick losses and are paving the way for more certain success. The advent of the coal stove and coal oil stove brooders brought a great change in brooding methods and has done much to put brooding on a business-like basis. With the brooder stove we have had as high as five hundred chicks under a coal stove brooder, and have seen coal oil brooders at the Queen Anne Poultry Farm brood more than 1700 chicks successfully and with no more trouble than if there were only a few hundred there. The old time lamp brooders we have found to be a failure by experience and have advised Kent poultry raisers time after time to do away with them. Chicks require plenty of heat, dry quarters, lots of fresh air and abundant room for exercise. These are all available with stove brooders. Many of the chick diseases, especially white diarrhea and gapes, fail to appear when brooding conditions are right. Many poultry raisers, who have made failures with other types of brooders, make a success when they use brooder stoves and we would suggest to our readers to try one if they find that their present methods are not profitable.

Muscovy Ducks. — The Muscovy breed of ducks originated in South America. They are very active. The drake will weigh around ten pounds if given the proper conditions to thrive under, while the female weighs around five or six pounds. The period of incubation is from 34 to 35 days. The standard admits two varieties—white and colored. They are cared for as are other ducks. The ducklings are fed largely on ground food with plenty of green stuff, which may be put in the mash. Water should be before all ducks constantly in such a form that they cannot get into it with their feet. Sand or coarse gravel should be put in the feed once a day. All ducks must have a dry place to sleep.

Poultry For The Young.—Poultry raising appeals to the young people in many instances. The boys and girls who like poultry and would take an interest in fowls should have a chance to raise poultry and use the income as they please. Parents often may help their children in many ways by letting them raise chickens. One of our youngest chicken raisers in Chestertown is Master Eshman, son of the proprietor of the Vosheil House. This business learns many things to a young person. It learns them patience, kindness and resourcefulness and it will help them to become good men and women.

Better Sires—The United States Department of Agriculture has inaugurated a "better sires" campaign for all kinds of live stock, including poultry. The federal department knows something about the value of a pure-bred sire in poultry breeding, because crosses have been made on the government poultry farm at Beltsville, Md., to determine what results can be accomplished in grading up mongrels. This experimental work in cross-breeding has been done with pure-bred Barred Plymouth Rock and White Plymouth Rock sires. The Plymouth Rocks are the largest of the six breeds that comprise the American class. A matured cock and hen should not weigh less than 9 and 7 pounds respectively, and a cockerel and pullet should weigh 7 and 5 pounds respectively. When bred somewhat for meat direction of size, and it meets the less considerable possibilities in the dierction of size, and it meets the most exacting demand for roasting or large type fowls. The farm fowls of the northern states owe much of their size to the Plymouth Rocks. In the southern states small types of mongrel breeds predominate, and this is said to be due to the fact that very few Plymouth Rocks are raised there.
