REVERIES OF AN APPLE.

BY HENRY MOORE.

"My cheeks are plump, my glowing skin
Is flecked with red and yellow dapple,
And lofty hopes arise within.—
I am a most ambitious apple.

"Shall I, puffed up and high of heart
With pride I feel but may not utter,
Rise glorious into regal tart,—
Or sink in shame to apple-butter?

"Shall I in rare roast-goose's train
As dainty sauce bid joy betide her,
Or by some churlish rustic swain
Be sucked up through a straw as cider?"

Alas! the pretty hopes were spoiled
Which used its reveries to sweeten,—
'T was in a vulgar dumpling boiled,
And in a dumpling it was eaten.

LOVE DOWN A WELL.

BY ELLIOTT MACKINTOSH.

Do you see that lady on the other side of the fire-place, with soft brown hair and mild blue eyes, whose fair complexion and unwrinkled brow doff ten years from her age, and whose quiet voice and gentle manners tell truly of a shy, retired nature? That's my wife! Ah! ain't I proud of her, and don't I love her? Haven't I an insane desire to run to the roof and shout out, for the benefit of the world at large, that Mary Sherman nee Lee is my wife! You would never suspect her of being a heroine, but, I'll tell you the story, and then judge.

Thirty years ago this summer, when my hair was brown and my limbs young and active, heigho! I was sent by the firm, to whose service I had been devoted by my father, to collect bills in some of the New England villages. I was new to the country, but I had full directions given me, and started off on a two months' trip to make the Yankees pay for the calicoes, silks, and notions they had purchased of "Law, Stone & Co."

I had fared pretty well on my errand, and was putting up at the Bell-Flower Inn, when one of our customers invited me to come to a gathering of young folks at his house, and I accepted the offer. There I met Mary Lee, and lost my heart instantly. I was returning home from the farmer's good cheer, when I met with the accident that colored my whole future life, gave me its greatest joy, its heaviest sorrow. Crossing a meadow, I, in the darkness, set my foot upon a plank which tilted, and I fell, down, down, losing consciousness long before I reached the end of my subterranean descent. How long I lay insensible I cannot tell; but I woke in bitter agony, feeling that I was fearfully injured. I called and groaned, but the darkness above me was unbroken by any friendly gleam of light, the heavy silence cheered by no succoring voice. Day dawned, finding me still sensible, suffering, and alone. As the streaks of light broke above me, I saw that I had fallen down a long dried well, half-filled with rubbish, and covered with loose boards at the top. One of these had given way under the pressure of my foot. This well, I learned later, was on farmer Lee's farm, and was being gradually filled up with any dirt that would have been otherwise carted away. The customary stone-work round the mouth had been long ago removed for the convenience of backing up the carts. How, in the dark, I had strayed from the road on the large, open field, can only be explained by my ignorance of the localities and my castle-building, inspired by the sweet face of Mary Lee.

Morning dawned, and I was lying almost frantic in my agony, when I heard a young, fresh voice singing above me. I called loudly, "Help! help!"

"Where?" The singing ceased, and the question came in a startled tone.

"Here! I have fallen down a well!"

The boards above me were pushed aside, and the daylight, farther advanced than I had perceived in my darkened position, poured in.

"Down here! Oh! you must be fearfully hurt! George! John! Come quick!"

Hurrying feet came above me.

"Some one go down!" said the first voice again. "Have you a rope?"

"Ay! the old rope is here; but it ain't over and above strong! It won't bear a man."

"I'll trust it! He has fainted."

For I was too much exhausted to answer any of the questions they shouted to me. The reaction of promised relief was too great after such a night as I had passed. Before I realized the purport of the last sentence, I knew by the darkening of the open mouth that some one was descending. I felt the dress of the brave woman, then a slender girl, touch my cheek; I heard her pitying tones; I knew she raised my head, as she stood in the twilight beside me; but I could not speak. Others had hurried to the farm, and one for a surgeon. Wine was lowered, and she knelt beside me to revive me by it. Three long hours, they told me later, passed before the arrangements were completed to hoist us up, and she never left my side. She bathed my face with the water they lowered; she gave me wine; she spoke words of cheer and comfort; she aided me when the basket was at last lowered, in rising from my painful posture, and almost lifted me into the vehicle after reaching the upper air. And when the long fainting fit that followed my arrival above was succeeded by days of delirium, she was my faithful nurse. How I loved her cannot be told. When the truth became known that my left side, arm, and leg, were crippled and useles forever, then I tried to smother my love, and learned hers. Mary Lee, the pet of the village, the idol of home, the centre of many loving hearts, left all to follow her crippled husband to his city home.

If, by the exercise of the talents God gave me, I have made my brain work for my hands—if my right hand has earned a home of more luxury than competence—if by the love of a lifetime I have humbly endeavored to make her happy, did she not earn all this, and more, ay, more than I can ever give her?

For the SENTINEL.

LETTER FROM MONTREAL.

As I closed my last letter after writing of Niagara Falls, I shall resume at that point.

Continuing our journey by way of New York Central Railroad along the Niagara River seven miles, to Lewiston, the first steamboat landing, we here bade adieu to the United States. After all trunks were examined, the whistle of little "Cibola" was blown and she steamed away for Toronto. Reaching Toronto all passengers for Montreal and intervening ports boarded the steamer "Algerian." An afternoon and night were passed on Lake Ontario with distant shores visible on the north and nothing but the blue expanse of waters to be seen on the south. The Kingston harbor was reached at 5 o'clock, A. M. Leaving Kingston we entered the beautiful Thousand Islands at the entrance of the St. Lawrence River. Here, with the materials—rocks, earth, beauteous verdure—and with the bright, blue waters of the St. Lawrence as a background, that Artist Divine, whose designs are not confined within the limits of a few yards of canvas, has established one of Nature's picture galleries. Gliding for forty miles along its watery corridors, these sixteen hundred isles exhibit all varieties of size and outline. Some with high, rock-bound banks, others with their green shrubbery dipping in the water; some mere little dots of grass or a moss-covered rock, others so large that on them the farmer rejoices "under his own vine and fig tree." On some too are fine villas, and here and there is a light-house; also among them is a pleasure ground called Thousand Island Park.

When the Islands finally began to diminish in number and interest, the passenger might amuse himself in various ways. He might engage in conversation; might view the beautiful, wide river with its picturesque shores beyond; might take naps; might revert to the exploits of Jacques Cartier and other old adventurers on the St. Lawrence; might read books and papers; might play on the piano if a musician; might delight his palate with oranges, bananas, apples, peaches or pears; but, as the far-famed Rapids in the St. Lawrence River were neared, everybody was on the qui vive and nearly all went on deck and sat there to watch the dangerous sailing. At these places the waters flow swiftly through a rocky channel. At the first approach, the smooth, peaceful river begins to quiver with little ripples, in a few minutes the boat is amid waves on every side; sometimes the entire width of the river seemed in a tumult, sometimes we sailed in comparatively smooth waters while other portions of the channel were agitated. There are quite a number of these places; some, however, are passed with a few minutes' sailing, others require probably twenty minutes. The danger is not at all from the size of the waves, but from the large, invisible rocks which fill the river bed. No steam is, of course, required for sailing and the clanking of chains, as the pilot guides the boat, is the only sound heard. The Lachine Rapids, just above Montreal, are the most dangerous of all. They are about one-half mile in length. At one place, called the Red Rock, some rocks are seen above the water, and it is said that these rocks are only four or six feet wider apart than space for boats to pass through. When again in smooth waters, at 7 o'clock, P. M., all passengers on board, about one hundred in number, began to prepare for landing at Montreal, the spires of which soon appeared; and which to us were a welcome sight after being on water thirty-two hours and sailing about three hundred and seventy-five miles.

Now, that some great power might guide my pen to portray to your readers the interesting features of this metropolis far away, in the domains of Her Gracious Majesty, Victoria, Queen of England. Montreal's population is about one hundred and fifty thousand. The Island of Montreal, which is thirty miles long and ten miles wide, contains many towns and villages, making the population of the entire Island to be about two hundred thousand. An editorial in one of the daily papers, last week, pictured the brilliant future of Montreal in which she is to extend over all the Island.

Every city has its individualities. One of the chief ones here, to those who express themselves according to the vocabulary of the English language, is to hear la langue Francais lavishly dispensed everywhere by more than one-half the population. The dining-room overflows with it, streets are full of it; signs of business houses read like this: J. B. Sagazan & Cie. (J. B. Sagazan & Co.), Granger Freres (Granger Bros.). In the City Hall and in the Court House, French and English appear side by side in all notices and names of offices. Of the eleven daily newspapers six are French.

Commerce and trade are apparently in a flourishing condition. The business streets are full of bustle and activity; street cars, all descriptions of vehicles for every purpose of business or pleasure, sidewalks lined with hurrying passers-by, large glass fronts in which are represented the merchandise of dry-goods merchants, boot and shoe dealers, hat and furriers, merchant tailors, booksellers, milliners, furniture dealers, jewellers, music dealers, paper hangers—in a word, all the business exhibits, all the commotion of busy streets are repeated over and over for squares and squares just as in our own large cities.

Montreal is noted for the many fine churches which it contains. There are seventy-seven. Of these, twenty are Roman Catholic; sixteen, Presbyterian; fourteen, Episcopal; twelve, Methodist. These church edifices are almost without exception built of grey-stone with lofty spires and in elegant as well as dignified styles of architecture. Amid the busy scenes of Notre-Dame street, upon Place d'Armes, stands the Parish Church of Notre-Dame, the most notable of all Montreal's temples of worship. The length of the church is two hundred and fifty-five feet, its breadth one hundred and thirty-four feet. It is built after the model of Notre Dame in Paris. A vast congregation of French-speaking citizens worship there. The church contains sittings for ten thousand persons and on some occasions has been known to hold fifteen thousand persons. Two very wide galleries, one above the other and extending around three sides of the auditorium, greatly increase the space for sittings. From either corner of the church front rises a large tower to the height of two hundred and twenty-seven feet. The bells in these towers are another wonder. In one tower is the great Bourdon Bell, said to be the largest in America, and which cost twenty-five thousand dollars. The weight of the bell is twenty-four thousand seven hundred and eighty pounds. It is eight feet and seven inches in diameter, and six feet and nine inches in height. It is one foot thick. The clapper weighs eight hundred and sixty pounds. This is not the only bell of Notre-Dame. In the other tower is a cluster of ten bells. To ring the Bourdon Bell requires the strength of twelve men. The other ten bells are rung by eighteen men. The Bourdon Bell is only used on great occasions, then it and the other ten bells are all rung together. The cost of ringing all these bells, one time, is twenty-eight dollars, and on some great occasions they are all rung three times in one day. Another great Catholic edifice, now in course of construction, is St. Peter's Cathedral, on Dominion Square, built after the model of St. Peter's at Rome. A Methodist Church of very large proportions and of great architectural skill and beauty is also in course of construction on St. Catherine street. Its walls are of granite imported from Scotland. It is stated that it will be the largest Methodist Church in the Dominion of Canada.

First among the educational institutions of Montreal is McGill University with about forty professors and five hundred students. The buildings are finely situated in a large park on McGill street at the base of Mount Royal. There is also a Presbyterian College devoted to the training of ministers and missionaries. There is also Montreal College and Grand Seminary with a large number of students and professors; a Jesuit College, and several convent schools.

Montreal is adorned with quite a number of pretty little parks and squares. One much frequented is Viger Gardens which contains a large greenhouse, two large fountains and is well shaded. Dominion Square is a beautiful grass-plot in which are large beds of geraniums with border plants of varied colors. One of the suburban parks of the city is Mount Royal, a little mountain north of the city, which rises to the height of about seven hundred and fifty feet. An inclined railing has been constructed up its side. This railing is five hundred and ten feet long and rises at a very sharp angle with level land. Mount Royal has not been artificially beautified beyond the placing of seats for the comfort of visitors and the erection of an observatory. One of the chief attractions of the park is the elevated view it affords of the city at its base. The well shaded city, its large City Hall, the lofty towers of Norte-Dame and the many other fine spires, the dome of Bonsecours Market, the high, smoky chimneys of manufacturing establishments, the wharves lined with boats and ocean steamers, the beautiful St. Lawrence, Victoria railway bridge of one and three-fourth miles, spanning the river—all these objects appear in the bird's eye view.

In Montreal many, indeed very many, of the streets are narrow and the side-walks correspondingly so also, yet the great purity of the air and pleasantness of the climate seem to be some apology. (During a three weeks' sojourn, the weather though sometimes quite warm has not been oppressive.) One of the finest residence-streets is Sherbrooke street in the north of the city. This street is rather wide and very shady. Before nearly every residence is a lawn, some of which are beautifully adorned with plants and flowers. The residences themselves are large and mostly of ornamental designs; the material used for building being greystone, which is almost universally used for all buildings, public, private and eclesiastical.

Now, before leaving Montreal we pause to say "Long live Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, and greatly prosper this British metropolis"; yet with rejoicing will we return to the land where floats the stars and stripes.

The Stewart Millions.

From N. Y. LETTER.

The moral about "the curse of riches" has never been more forcibly painted for the general public than in the proceedings to break the will of Mrs. A. T. Stewart. When her husband died the millionaire's wife, who had had but little comfort and no happiness up to that time, might have reasonably looked forward to somewhat of a royal time during the rest of her four-score years. But the poor old lady, desolate and alone, found life as hard a burden as ever. Her husband left her an estate of a dozen millions or more, yet at the end of the first year she found herself in debt and her indebtedness kept growing to the end of the chapter. As she grew poorer the Hiltons grew richer, and yet never for a moment did they let her out of their grasp or from beneath their eyes. The testimony of the old book-keeper tells a story of fact that outdoes any romance. He says that the day A. T. Stewart died his confidential friend and adviser, Judge Hilton, went to the office and examined his books, not waiting until the millionaire's flesh grew cold. Then he took thirty per cent. from the $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 at which the dead man's share in the business was valued, and proceeded to sell the latter to himself for $1,000,000 left him as a legacy. But this $1,000,000 was never paid to Mrs. Stewart; it was "owed" to her, and meanwhile she was brought in debt for nearly all the money she wanted. The poor old lady was helpless; she had none but the Hilton family within reach; and so she drifted on through life, hampered for money in the midst of wealth, and died a genteel pauper. Many a writer used to speak of Mrs. Stewart's great riches—of her picture-gallery, her jewels, her bric-a-brac and her laces—and women all over the land envied the great millionaire's widow her independent position; and all the time the woman who lived under guard in her white marble palace on Fifth avenue might have been willing to exchange places with the wife of a mechanic who pushed her baby-carriage past her widows, and who lived and did her own work in a hired tenement. The hearing has not been a pleasant one for Judge Hilton. It has brought out what I have hinted heretofore in this correspondence and have been certain of for five years. Stewart was a cruel man to his employes; an employe has signally avenged his cruelty.
