WALKING WITH GOD.

From Boston Watchman.

"Enoch walked with God." That is the sum of his biography, yet it contains volumes. When we say of a man he walks with God, we are sure of many things that accompany that walk, which can never be separated from it, as when Paul speaks of "things that accompany salvation." That expression lets you into his secret thoughts, and lays bare the hidden springs of his being. We know that Enoch must have spent many hours alone with God, like Him whose resort at night was the Mount of Olives. He did not question the wisdom or goodness of God when events looked dark or mysterious. If cherished plans were thwarted, or that he prized the most must be given up, he could still say: "Thy will be done." From that expression we know what must have been his aim in his intercourse with his associates. "The law of truth was in his mouth." He was a good neighbor, and "the law of kindness was on his lips." He loved those "things that make for peace."

In matters of business he was honest and upright, doing to others as he could reasonably expect them to do in a change of circumstances; else he could not have walked with God. We know that he was temperate in all things; in eating and drinking, and in his judgment of others. His daily life was salutary in the community where he lived. His words may have been few, but there was an argument in life that none could gainsay or resist. They may have sometimes thought that he was over pious; yet they respected his honesty, and were conscious that "their rock was not like his rock;" when they were in distress or sorrow they sought his counsel and prayers. His was not a religion to suit the occasion, but a part of himself—a life. It did not consist exclusively in a happy frame of mind, and pleasurable emotions, but in having a firm trust in God, and a heart to do His will at all times, and everywhere. So "he walked with God."

THE DOGS AND THE ROBBERS.

A tragical story is told of an adventure that happened to the monks of St. Bernard, when the breed of their celebrated dogs was at its full perfection. No less than thirty robbers to whom the supposed possession of the monastry offered booty, had, by degrees, introduced themselves into the retreat, arriving in parties at intervals, and were always received in the most friendly manner. As soon as the whole band assembled they threw off their concealment and summoned the abbot to produce the keys of the treasure. The monk was, fortunately, a man of more resolute character than usually occurred in these places of seclusion, and did not lose his presence of mind. He observed to them mildly that their conduct was unworthy and an ill-return for the hospitable attention they had received. The robbers, as may be supposed, were deaf to the appeal and continued their demand. "If it must be so," said the superior, "as we have no means of defending ourselves, I must submit; follow me, therefore, to the spot where the treasure is kept." He led the way and was tumultuously attended by the eager band. He placed his hand on a door, but before opening it turned his back and made another appeal. He was answered with execration, and no choice being left him he threw the door wide open. It was the den in which the dogs were kept; he raised his voice, to which a loud yell responded, then gave a rapid signal, and in an instant the powerful animals bounded forth upon their prey, tearing some, strangling others, and sending a few of the robbers who escaped their attack flying for their lives headlong down the mountain in frantic terror, to be dashed to pieces over the precipices which yawned beneath their feet.

"I notice," remarked Amy, "that the milk shake is making a heap of fuss now" "Yes," replied the High School girl, "the lacteal agitation is responsible for considerable perturbation."

Subscriber—"Why is my paper so damp every issue?"
Editor—"Because there is so much due on it."
Exit subscriber suddenly.

He is happy whose circumstances suit his temper; but he is more excellent who can suit his temper to any circumstances.

When you rise in the morning form the resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow-creature.

The world is like a wheel incessantly revolving on which human things alternately rise and fall.

Don't despise a thing because it's little. A quart jug will hold more than most men.

"This is an age of wonders," said a man as he made a straw hat felt by touching it.

He is the best Christian, not who talks most of God, but who walks most with God.
