AGRICULTURAL NOTES

STATE SEED WHEAT SHOWS LOW GERMINATION

Germination of seed wheat throughout the Piedmont section of Maryland is considerably below normal report specialists of the University of Maryland Experiment Station who have been conducting a series of tests during the last few weeks. Farmers of that section are therefore being urged to make germination tests of their seed wheat and then increase the amount of seed sown accordingly.

A farmer whose wheat tests around 75 to 85 per cent should increase the amount of grain planted per acre about 25 per cent. That is, if the amount of grain usually planted is 1 1-2 bushels per acre he should increase this 1 1-2 pecks. If he usually plants around 2 bushels per acre he should increase the planting by 2 pecks to the acre. Wheat should normally germinate from 90 to 95 per cent, but this year the only wheat that has germinated that high has come from the Eastern Shore and the Atlantic Seaboard. The counties that are showing lowest germination in their seed wheat this fall are Montgomery, Howard, Carroll, Harford and Baltimore.

Farmers may either test their seed wheat themselves or have it tested by the Experiment Station. If they choose the latter method the sample should be sent to F. S. Holmes, seed inspector for the Station.

A very simple method for testing for germination at home is to put 100 grains between two blotters and after wetting the blotters place them between two ordinary dinner plates. The blotters are them kept moist for nine days and by that time the seed should have germinated. By counting the number of seed that have sprouted the per cent of germination may be ascertained. Another method is to plant the same number of seed in a shallow box and keep the soil wet for nine days. Counting the number of sprouting grain at the end of that time will give the per cent or germination.

Maryland suffers annually large losses from this disease and if it were not for the campaign inaugurated sometime ago by the Extension Service the loss would undoubtedly be much greater. Copper carbonate dust is the treatment advocated by the Service specialists and surveys made during June and July of this year indicate that about one third of the 1928 wheat crop will be free or nearly free of smut as a result of these preventative measures taken by the farmers in the State last year.

Mr. Oldenburg, specialist in agronomy of the Extension Service has just completed a tour of certain sections of the State during which he gave demonstrations of the proper methods for fighting smut. Mr. Oldenburg advises using a large 50 gallon barrel for treating. The barrel is mounted on uprights and the grain and dust are thoroughly mixed inside by rotating the barrel with cranks which are fastened to each end. One and a half ounces of copper carbonate dust will treat one bushel of wheat. The 50 gallon sized barrel will hold about two bushels of wheat at a time and for one filling the barrel should be rotated about fifty times. The wheat is put in the mixer through a trap door cut in the side.

The barrel should be strong and tight so that little of the dust will escape as it is very poisonous and extremely irritating to the nose and throat. For this reason the work should be done out of doors.

Poultry Specialist Speaks Over Radio

In a radio talk from station WRC, Washington, on Tuesday evening, W. R. Rice, poultry specialist of the University of Maryland Extension Service talked on the more common mistakes made by beginners in the poultry business. As Mr. Rice explains, many people seem to think that because a hen seems to be well and healthy and can move around and forage for herself, that all that is necessary is to give her a little feed, furnish shelter during part of the year, and then gather in the eggs and sell them. Often therefore beginners have a rude awakening which hurts not only their pride but also their pocketbooks.

Extravagance, it is declared, accounts for more failures in the poultry business than any one other cause and this applies primarily to house and equipment. Along with this is the question of where to place the poultry plant and in this particular extreme care should be taken to see that the house is in a dry, warm, clean location. One of the best sources of information about the kind of house to build is the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

Many people select their chickens because that particular breed has proved successful for someone else but Mr. Rice stresses the point that each breed has been successful for someone and that the breed selected should be the one that the person enjoys working with most.

Plenty of green stuffs in the feed, strong wholesome chicks to start with, a careful study of poultry raising from reliable sources and not taking advise from just anyone but rather from the U. S. Department of Agriculture or the State College are good points to be remembered if one would be a successful breeder, it is declared.

NEW CIRCULAR ISSED ON CONTROL OF SMUT

A new circular describing methods of control for wheat smut has just been completed by specialists of the University of Maryland Extension Service and may be obtained at this time free of charge by anyone. The circular gives a comprehensive history of the disease in the State, the estimated losses by it, how to recognize its presence and the latest methods of control. A number of photographs and drawings greatly aid in explaining certain points.
