Nearly Sixty Years of Service

Years are the test-fires of the modern newspaper. Is one generation enough to test the solidity of today's popularity? What will the boys and girls of today think of the "popularity" of the "popular" newspaper tomorrow? When a newspaper passes through the test-fires of nearly three score years of service, and continues to hold its place for character and reliability it is a pretty good indication that those who direct its destinies have the right vision.

Nearly sixty years of service to the people of Delaware and the territory it covers has enabled Every Evening to maintain its place as the leading newspaper in all those essentials which really go to make a newspaper worth while---to readers and advertisers aliks.

With an enlarged local staff, with the full Associated Press wire service and numerous special and exclusive features, Every Evening is now able to cover the field more thoroughly than ever before and give the people of the territory it covers a better and more complete newspaper.

How interesting Every Evening has come to be may be seen from a survey of its more important features. These are not features for one day only but for every day, and compare favorably with features of the larger metropolitan newspapers in cities much larger than Wilmington.

Order the paper from your nearest dealer---or write Circulation department.
