Black is White.

The word black (Anglo-Saxon blac, blæc, bleak,) is fundamentally the same as the old German blach, now only to be found in two or three compounds, as Blachfeld, a level or plain: Blachmahl, the scum which floats on the top when silver is melted, and Blachfrost, and it meant originally "level," "bare," and was used to denote blackness, because blackness is (apparently) bare of color. But the nasalized form of black is blank, which also meant originally bare, and was use to denote whiteness, because whiteness is (apparently) bare of color. The same word was used to denote the two opposite things. From which it would seem that black is white. To any one who shall point out a flaw in this etymological argument I shall endeavor to be grateful, provided he does not disturb the very satisfactory conclusion. This I should naturally resent. It may help him to a conclusion and serve as a further support to my contention to point out that blac in Anglo-Saxon actually means "white" as well as "black," so that it is not in its nasalized form only that the same word is employed to express opposite things. Why is this, unless that to the primitive mind both white and black appeared to agree in being bare or void of color, and for that reason to deserve the same name? And here I can not help harboring a suspicion, suggested by the Old German Blachfrost (which appears to be nearly obsolete, or only used in some localities) that our "black frost" meant originally a frost bare of accompaniments, as hoar, rime, and it is a coincidence only that it should be black in color and blacken the vegetation. But we have long lost hold of the original meaning and believe it to refer to the color.

Christian Joy.

The Rev. Professor Elmslie, speaking recently on Christian joy, said we needed to rid religion of all dullness and of all repulsive coldness and sternness. The perfection of all Christian rejoicing and living is just —if we could but do it as Christ wanted it—to live truly and altogether in the world, but not of the world. He was not quite sure whether it was not the first symptom of the Church's corruption when they put the crucifix upon the altar. The young, brave-hearted, rejoicing and conquering Church did not do it. Is that the last word of the gospel—"Christ died?" No! That crucified Christ would mean the world's despair if that were his final form. What makes our triumph, our hope, our faith, our life, our rejoicings in the certainty of victory, is that crucified Christ risen, ascended, reigning; and that is the Christ they would find painted in the chancel of all the early Christian churches. The crucified, dead Christ came in later. But that risen, reigning Christ on the throne is "as a Lamb that had been slain." The marks of his death, his atonement, are there. It is the crucified, but the crucified, triumphant Christ.

Spreading Shad.

Previously to 1870 no shad were found in the Pacific ocean or in any of its tributaries. Between 1870 and 1875 the United States Fish Commission introduced a few young shad into the Sacramento river. The number was very small, but the little fishes made their way down to the Pacific to feed and grow large and fat, and to return at last to the fresh water to reproduce their kind. Some of them came back to the same river, but others, following the warm Pacific current, wandered further north into other rivers, until now the shad is in some places sufficiently abundant to furnish profitable fisheries, and it is distributed along more than three thousand miles of the Pacific coast of North America, and is still spreading northward in such a way as to indicate that it will, in a few years, be found in the rivers of Asia, so that the descendants of the shad of the Chesapeake bay will increase the food supply of China.

So indestructible by wear or decay is the African teakwood that vessels built of it have lasted fully 100 years, to be then broken up only on account of their poor sailing qualities on account of faulty models. The wood, in fact, is one of the most remarkable employed in human industries on the score of its great weight, hardness and durability, its weight varying from some forty-two to fifty-two pounds per cubic foot. It works easily, but because of the large quantity of silex contained in it the tools employed in its manipulation are in a short time worn away. It, however, possesses the advantage of containing an oil which prevents the spikes and other iron work with which it may come in contact from rusting.

A shoemaker in Union City, Ind., in addition to his work on the bench, sells pianos and organs. He ought to be able to put soleful tunes in his music or tuneful music in his soles, as the case may require.

A visit to a grocery is generally the beginning of a new order of things.
