Executors' Sale

OF A VALUABLE LITTLE

Property!

In Hampstead district, Carroll county, Md.

BY virtue of the authority contained in the last will and testament of Samuel Snyder, deceased, and an order of the Orphan's Court of Carroll county, the undersigned will offer at public sale, on the premises, in Snydersburg, on the road leading from Snydersburg to Cranberry, and about 2½ miles from Hampstead, on the B. & H. R. R., on Tuesday, September 17th, A. D. 1889, at 10 o'clock, a. m., sharp, the one-half interest in all those two tracts or parcels of land, lying contiguous to each other, containing of land, more or less, and being the same which the said Samuel Snyder obtained by deed from Charles T. Reifsnider and Alpha M. Ruby, Trustees. The improvements consist of a large and comfortable log weatherboarded Dwelling House, containing 5 rooms; a good stable, stone dairy, good brick hen house, spring of running water, and all other necessary outbuildings. This property is well adapted to the tanning business, and has been used for that purpose many years; the vats are all in good condition; the property has a very good water power belonging to it, and is a good location for a distillery or creamery. There is also a large tan-shop and bark shed on this property, good as new. There is a large, fine orchard of choice varieties of fruit trees in thriving and bearing condition. It is convenient to churches, schools, mills, post-office, &c., situate in a beautiful little village, in a thoroughly intelligent community. Possession given April 1st, 1890.

7 ACRES, 3 ROODS AND 8 PERCHES

N. B.—The other one-half interest will be sold on the same day, at the same hour, on the premises, by John H. Leister and Geo. L. Stocksdale, Trustees of Jesse L. Leister. See advertisement in "The Democratic Advocate" and by hand bills.

Terms of Sale, as prescribed by the Court: One-third of the purchase money to be paid to said Executors on the day of sale, or on the ratification thereof by the said court, and the residue in two equal payments, the one payable in one year and the other payable in two years from the day of sale, the credit payments to be secured by the bonds or single bills of the purchaser or purchasers, with sufficient security, bearing interest from the day of sale.

For further information call upon or address Elisha A. Snyder, at Snydersburg, or George L. Stocksdale, Attorney-at-Law, Westminster, Maryland.

RED ROSES.

Dear, let me linger here a while,
Lo! we have journeyed many a mile,
That I might see once more
The gray old house where I was born,
And pluck, this sunny Summer morn,
The roses by the door.

How rich and red they are! How sweet!
Like those fair blooms that used to greet
My wondering, baby gaze;
Like those I wore so long ago,
At simple feast and country show,
In girlhood's careless days.

My mother's fingers twined them round
The clustering curls that fell unbound;
My father smiled to see;
Ah, love me! love me, darling mine!
I lost their love in winning thine,
I lost them finding thee!

It seems, dear heart, but yesterday
We met in yon lone country way,
And loitered in the lane;
Love struck its magic hour that noon,
Love set our pulses to a tune
Of mingled joy and pain.

How fain we were to learn the song!
Though all too roughly flowed along
The course of true love's stream;
For eyes most dear to me on earth
Looked coldly on thy modest worth;
Then fled our happy dream.

I found it hard to choose between
Their hearts, that all my life had been
So tender and so true,
And thine, as tender, but untried,
To merge the daughter in the bride,
The old love in the new.

I did not fear to count the cost;
Thy love hath paid me all I lost,
Good measure, brimming o'er;
And yet I see, this Summer morn,
Through tears, the house where I was born,
The roses by the door.

Ah, love! thy love is like the flowers,
It fills my life with happy hours,
With color and perfume;
But if I pull the leaves aside,
I find a grief I fain would hide,
A thorn among the bloom.

Nay, dearest, do not turn away,
Thou knowest all my heart would say,
That sometimes it must ache.
Come where the churchyard grasses wave,
And lay thou on their quiet grave
Red roses for my sake!

—ALL THE YEAR ROUND.

Select Story.

THE DEACON'S PARTY.

Deacon Goodman was the very best man that ever lived. So at least said his friends and neighbors, who certainly ought to know: and for the enemies, he probably had not one in the world. It is true, however, that the remark above quoted was generally made as a sort of apologetic preface to something like the following: "But, then, he has such queer notions; he is so unlike anybody else, that we hardly know what to make of him." Perhaps these worthy people were oblivious of the fact that in order to be very good it is often a painful necessity to be different from one's neighbors.

We cannot better illustrate Deacon Goodman's peculiarities than by describing a little entertainment given by him at this country seat not long ago; for the deacon, with all his unworldly goodness, is a prosperous merchant in New York, and the owner (by perfectly fair means) not only of a brownstone front in the city, but a charming suburban residence. The deacon's wife, though a very good woman in her way, was far less peculiar than her husband. She fell quite gracefully into an amiable conformity with the ways of the world, and is not to be distinguished from the thousands of good women—of the wealthy class—who throng our city churches. Their two daughters, Miss Adelaide and Miss Ellen, had just left the restraints of their fashionable school, and enjoyed the prospect of "coming out" another winter as full-fledged members of society. "Husband," said Mrs. Deacon one May morning soon after the family emigration to the country!—"Husband, you know we did not give that dinner that we were proposing last winter. What do you say to having it here instead? We are so convenient to the city that they can easily come out in coaches."

"You gave a large party, did you not, which included all that should have been your dinner guests?"

"Dear me, yes! but that was quite a different thing. Now, at this little affair I am speaking of, I should want only our most particular friends."

"Oh! if that is the plan, I like it well," rejoined the warm hearted deacon. "But why not ask them to pass a week with us?"

"Ask—whom?"

"Well, your brother John's family first; the children would enjoy it. And then—"

"Oh! you don't understand at all. I mean only a few of the best families, whose acquaintaince it is most desirable to cultivate."

"Really, wife, it does not seem quite honorable to invite guests for our own selfish purposes. I can sell hardware with a good conscience, but the hospitality of my house—"

"Who wants to sell the hospitalities of your house? No, no, my dear, that is one of your odd notions. Everybody in society does just as I am proposing. And, after all, this inviting is only as we would be done by."

"True, true," said the deacon, with a merry laugh. "But why not do this favor with some one who will value it—to whom it will be real kindness. There are hundreds now whom I could name to whom a day spent among these green trees, in the fresh sweet air of the country, would be an event to remember for a year."

"Oh, if you mean a charitable visit, that is very good in its place, but very different from the matter I have in hand. For our children's sake, my dear, it really is a duty to hold our place in good society."

The deacon was always accessible to considerations of duty. He merely said:—"Well, name your day and give me a list. I will have the invitations sent from my office."

"A capital thought; your accountant there is such a splendid penman. And as to the names, you know the families to whom we are under the greatest obligations. I would have the company as select as possible, and I will try to make the whole affair pass off finely," said the worthy lady, beaming already with amiable complacency upon her prospective guests.

The expected day arrived. Mrs. Goodman and daughters, their elegant toilets at last perfected, were seated in the drawing-room, whose long windows looked across a cool veranda and commanded the way of approach from the city. Though the fingers were occupied with light fancy work, expectant eyes were glancing continually down the road to meet the first arrival.

"No one will come for an hour yet, you may be sure," said Mrs. G. "Your father has such a horror of late hours that he wanted us to be dressed by 4 o'clock."

"I never saw an omnibus on this road before," said Miss Ellen, as one of these plebian vehicles made its appearance over the brow of the hill.

"Chartered for some special purpose," said her mother, absently, as she mused upon the dinner.

"There is another!" said Adelaide.

"And another!" added Ellen.

"There is quite a procession of them," said her mother.

"And the first one is stopping at our gate!" exclaimed Ellen.

"What in the world can all these forlorn looking creatures want here?" cried Adelaide, in consternation.

"Do go, and send them away before our company comes," said Mrs. Goodman.

"I have seen some of them at the industrial school," said Ellen, with a sudden gleam of merriment; "can this be one of father's curious tricks?"

"It certainly is," said Adelaide, "for here he comes himself out of that omnibus."

And in fact the good deacon was now seen making his way through a crowd of poor people, who stood humbly waiting near the gate, and offering his arm to a withered old lady, in rusty bombazine, who had been among the first arrivals, he presented her and the foremost of the guests to his lady, who stood in a rustle of astonishment and stiff brocade, on the veranda steps, and to his elegant daughters, who were half way between laughing and crying at the novelty of the scene before them.

Mrs. Goodman, fortunately, had the good sense of philosophy to perceive that a state of things which was manifestly not to be cured had better be endured with the best grace possible; and her innocent guests, though somewhat awe struck at such undreamed of magnificence of apparel, were all unconscious of the struggle—and triumph, too—of grace that was going on beneath the studied hospitality with which she received them.

There was the old lady in black, who proved to be a widow, and utterly alone in the world; about the supply of whose wants the deacon probably knew more than any man living. And there was an old man with one wooden leg; and a blind man, who was strongly suspected of having been seen at the wayside begging, until some benevolent individual—name unknown—had supplied him with a basket of saleable articles by means of which he was now able to support himself and family. There were women, too, with wan faces who seemed never to have enjoyed the blessing of God's air, and puny children in their arms, whose heavy eyes brightened at the sight of green grass and waving trees. The old people were soon seated in the house, on the piazza, while the children, under convoy of Miss Ellen, who entered heartily into the spirit of the occasion, scattered in merry games on the green lawn. Never was such play before; and to Ellen herself it seemed that the little birds never sang so sweetly nor the fresh summer air breathed so softly, and never was it so delightful to have a home in the country as this very day.

The company once disposed of, a sober second thought occurred to the lady hostess, more distressing doubtless than the first. An appealing look brought her husband to her corner. "What in the world am I to do?" she said, "I have not got half provisions enough for them to eat."

"That is all right," replied the deacon pointing to a market wagon which was just unloading at the kitchen gate. "There is an abundance for them all, and I have given directions to the cook."

Anxiety was needless; every arrangement had been completely made, and the entertainers devoted themselves again to their guests. Happily passed the hours of the golden afternoon. The ladies of the family recovered speedily from the shock of disappointment, and could not help admitting that they had never so thoroughly enjoyed a company before. It was only because the real delight of social life—that of conferring happiness on others—had never been so fully within their reach. It was a lesson well worth learning.

At 6 the company was assembled around the long table, which by the deacon's direction, had been spread upon the shady lawn; and never, probably, did guests more heartily unite in thanksgiving for the bounties of providence.

Before they arose from the banquet, there was a gorgeous sunset, all in full view, to be enjoyed by many who, within their narrow walls, were almost as effectually excluded from God's free picture gallery in the heavens, as from man's aristocratic ones on earth. At the same time the full moon was rising in the east, and then there was a delightful evening, with the dancing fire-flies among the grass, and the cool breezes that never dreamed of brick walls and heated pavements; and by nine o'clock, the whole company had departed in its train of conveyances for home.

The lady hostess was too tired or too thoughtful to demand explanation now. When children and servants had silently assembled in the sitting-room at the hour of prayer the worthy father of the family read from the great Bible the story of the feast given of old at the house of a chief Pharisee; and his voice lingered with special emphasis on the following words:

"When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends nor they brethren, neither thy kinsman nor thy rich neighbors, lest they also bid thee again and a recompense be made thee. But when thou makest a feast call the poor, the maimed, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed, for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."

He was certainly a strange man, that Deacon Goodman, and, unfortunately, very different from the rest of the world.

No Mothers in Fiction.

From ATLANTIC MONTHLY.

A sick youth was lying in bed, watching with quiet eyes his mother's form moving gently about the room where for weeks she had been ministering to him with tenderest heart and hands. There had been a stillness there for a little while, when the boy spoke: "I wonder why there are no mothers in fiction." "Why, there are, dear; there must be," the mother answered quickly; but when she tried to name one she found that none came at the call. When she related to me the little incident, I, too, immediately said that our memory must be strangely at fault that it did not furnish us with examples in plenty. Maternal love! Why, art was filled with illustrations of it, and so was literature. And yet, on making search, I, too, have failed to find the typical mother where it seems she would be so easily found. I have no large acquaintance with the imaginative literature of any language but our own, and the fiction of other countries may afford examples in this kind of which I know nothing. But recalling the work of our own finest and best known writers, their treatment of the subject appears both scant and slight. Calling the roll of them from Fielding and Scott to Hawthorne and Hardy, it strikes one as singular that they one and all omitted to delineate with any peculiar force and beauty a human type which suggests itself so naturally as full of opportunity for artistic representation.

Another unbreakable substitute for glass, a French invention, consists in immersing wire in a heated state in a thin paste formed of soluble glass, gelatine and glycerine, or glucose, in proportions varying according to the use for which the material is designed. When nearly dry, the sheets are dipped in a concentrated solution of chrome alum or bichromate of potash. Any desired coloring matter may be incorporated with the gelatine, and copal or other protective varnish applied to the surface.

Dog Stories.

Dog stories would seem to be coming into fashion again. A correspondent in the St. James' Gazette writes: "I have a collie puppy, sprung from a breed noted for its remarkable intelligence, whom I have had to continually chastise for his persistence in selecting the best sofa for his afternoon nap. He apparently set his mind to reasoning over this, and came to the right conclusion—that he was punished for the damage to the sofa cover. Accordingly, the other day he rolled up a piece of carpet which had been set apart for his nightly accommodation in the servants' hall, and having carried it in his mouth to the drawing room, spread it out carefully on the forbidden sofa, where he was discovered sleeping the sleep of innocence, no doubt being quite satisfied that he had surmounted the only objection to his choice of a soft resting place."

This is a good story, but we think we can beat it. A friend of ours had a large retriever whom he continually had to chastise for going to sleep on his bed. One evening he went up to his room, and finding the dog suspiciously near the bed felt the counterpane, and by the animal warmth that it still retained discovered that there had been a repetition of the old offense. The dog was accordingly punished. Next night my friend again went up to bed, and on his way up stairs heard a heavy flop on the floor of the bedroom. Approaching quietly to the door he peeped in and beheld the sagacious animal standing upright, with his fore paws resting on the counterpane, while he was diligently blowing on the part on which he had been lying, with a view to removing all telltale symptoms of temperature.

A Ghostly Happening.

Tales of ghostly happenings, even although they be but the veriest coincidences, are always attractive.

A lady who was a widow, and whose husband had been defrauded by his partner, came down to breakfast one morning looking strangely disturbed. Her husband's partner had been a man well known in Boston, but at this time he had given up his residence there and was living in the State of Maine. It may be that his removal had been in part at least brought about by the public indignation which was felt at his crooked dealings with his late partner, and with the widow, whom he had defrauded in the most high handed fashion, although not in ways which made legal redress possible.

On the morning in question the lady stated that she had passed a most troubled night. "All night," she said, "I was pursued by X., who kept declaring that he wanted to make reparation to me for the wrong he had done, and that he could have no peace until he had done so." The family made various comments upon this, none of which were complimentary to Y. or to the tenderness of his conscience; but the dream, if dream it were, was fixed in their minds and made memorable when that afternoon's papers contained a telegram announcing the death of X. on the night before.

Mule Courage.

An interesting incident, illustrating that at times even a mule may develop remarkable courage, is related by M. Arnauld in his "History of animals." This animal belonged to a gentleman in Florence, and became so vicious and refractory that his master resolved to make away with him by exposing him to the wild beasts in the menagerie of the Grand Duke. For this purpose he was placed in the den of hyenas and tigers, all of whom he would soon have destroyed had he not been speedily removed. At last he was handed over to the lion, but the mule, instead of showing symptoms of alarm, quietly receded to a corner, keeping his front exposed to his adversary. Once planted in the corner he kept his place, eyeing the movements of the lion, which was preparing to spring upon him. The lion, however, perceiving the difficulty of an attack, practiced all his wiles to throw the mule off his guard, but in vain. At length the latter, perceiving an opportunity, made a sudden rush upon the lion and in an instant broke several of his teeth by the stroke of his fore feet. The "king of beasts," as he had been called, finding that he had got quite enough of the combat, slunk grumblingly to his cage and left the sturdy mule master of the field.

A gentleman down in Worth, Ga., has trained a large cat to hunt squirrels, and it is said that he can tree more squirrels in a day than the best dog. When the squirrel hides from the hunter, Tom is sent up the tree to find it. He rarely ever fails to run it around so that his master can shoot it. When going on a large expedition the cat will climb up on his master's shoulder or run along at his heels like a dog.
