PRODUCE MORE FOOD FOR FREEDOM

the CONSERVATION WAY

The farmer and many of his sportsman friends are beginning to wonder what dove, squirrel, rabbit, partridge wild duck and geese are going to taste like this fall.

The supply and distribution of this wild game depends almost entirely on what the farmer is going to do with his idle and submarginal land. All these animals and game birds must have food and shelter to survive. They are going to be found where food and shelter have been normally available to them.

Practically every farmer has some areas that could be and should be used for wildlife sanctuaries. During the late fall and early winter such things as late grain and corn serve as suitable food, but when the snow comes this food is covered and many times is not available to game birds. It is when the ground is covered with snow a wildlife feeding area will provide food for many birds and prevent their starving. These food patches will soon draw a considerable number of game birds to a farm.

Now is the time to think about seeing the District Supervisor of your local Conservation District if you are interested in providing food and shelter for game birds and animals during the winter. The District Supervisors will gladly prepare a Conservation Plan for your farm and locate the areas most suitable for wildlife plannings and food patches. They can provide you with a reasonable number of wildlife shurbs that hold their fruit high in the air all winter so that at no time will the birds need to go hungry.

Do not put this off as all planting stock is allocated by late fall. Your District Supervisors can help you in this work if you will but step forward. Do not be like the little girl who had to say to her boy friend, "Speak for yourself, John, speak".
