Europe's Oldest Gold Mine.

Not far from Bad Gastein, famous for the visits of the Austrian and German Emperors, amid the ice and snow of the Hohen-Tauern Mountains that separate Salzburg from Karnthen, is the oldest gold mine in Europe. It was once the richest also but to-day the traveler there will be better repaid than the miner. It is but recently that this region has been accessible to any but trained mountaineers, and even now, as will presently appear, there is a spice of danger in the visit to this, the loftiest seat of human industry in the world. Yet since the railroad has penetrated into the Salzachthal, not a few travelers find their way here in the summer, and even ladies are occasionally among them. The place has indeed a strange fascination, for among these glaciers are remains of work done under the Cæsars, and the miners, when their work is over, will tell you tales of the gold elves and their magic treasures with unshaken faith, though they sit beneath the white light of an electric lamp.

The Celts began the hunt for gold here, and after them the Romans carried on a long and successful work. But the period of the greatest glory of the mines lies in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. At Hof Gastein may still be seen the mansions of the Weitmoser, the Geissler, the Straffer, and others whose energy, culture, and philanthropy made these mines a model of co-operative industry for many decades. Under the mild rule of the Bishop of Salzburg their children studied in the schools of Nuremburg, Freiburg, and Ingolstadt, and brought to Gastein a culture that made them worthy hosts of the wealthy and learned gueste from Germany and Italy whom the hot baths already attracted.

Good Water.

Good water and an abundance of it is one of the prime necessities of modern civilization. It becomes more difficult to obtain, both in America and Europe, as the population each year grows denser. Hydraulic engineers are just now wrestling with this problem in England. In France, Austria, and Germany it is still unsolved. The medical faculty of these countries declare that the surface supply can no longer be relied upon, for hygienic reasons. They suggest the sinking of very deep artesian wells as the best method of procuring an adequate supply of water that shall be perfectly pure. The first experiment of this sort has just been tried in England, where the new London Water Company has completed a well eleven hundred feet deep and obtained an abundant flow of water, the analysis of which shows an entire absence of organic matter, or any element deleterious to health. Here in America the same cry comes up from nearly all our great cities. Philadelphia is seriously alarmed at the condition of the Schuylkill, which has supplied the Quaker city for one hundred and fifty years. New York is complaining of the scarcity of the limpid element, and wants the lakes of the Adirondack region tapped for the benefit of the metropolis. Chicago, with Lake Michigan at her doors, should have a supply of good water, if it is to be had on the continent, but Chicago declares that her crib and grand aqueduct must be carried ten miles further out into the lake to insure a perfect aqueous supply that is unpolluted. So it goes. To the engineer who can devise some method of meeting this urgent demand there will inure great reputation and a corresponding fortune.

Mrs. Hayes's Goat.

The telling of a joke upon oneself requires more self-denial than the majority of persons care to exercise. It has the advantage, however, of hurting nobody's feelings, and of affording a field for legitimate exaggeration. The late Mrs. Lucy Webb Hayes was especially fond of recounting her own defeats and mishaps, as this anecdote, which she told one evening at a dinner at the White House, will show:

It was at our home in Fremont, one evening in November, when without any warning the thermometer began falling and snowflakes filled the air. I was alone in the house with my youngest children and their colored nurse, Winnie. The men servants had gone to their homes before dark.

Suddenly I thought of poor Christopher Columbus, our long-haired pugnacious Angora goat, out in the pasture. It seemed cruel to leave him there without any shelter, so presently I went and asked Winnie to get a lantern and come with me.

At the barn we found a great box, into which we put some straw, and together we rolled and pushed and carried that box across the road and into the pasture.

Christopher saw the light, and came toward it. We retreated behind the fence, and tried to coax him into the place of shelter. Imagine our sentiments when he mounted to the top of the box, and there took up his abode for the night!
