SOIL CONSERVATION PLAN

Kent farmers are signing up erosion control agreements with the Soil Conservation Districts and the Soil Conservation Service for the following eight reasons among others.

1. To save their soil. Under the best of conditions, soil wears out faster than new soil can be formed. Since the soil is the basis of present and future prosperity it is fundamental that it be kept in place.

2. To save labor. Conservation plans include the retirement of land no longer capable of profitable tillage. Such land is used for permanent pasture or is reforested, which ever affords the better land use.

3. Sod is an important factor in soil building and in soil maintenance influencing crop production. Too many of us fail to realize that sod 's both cheaper and more effective in soil maintenance and in crop production than special green manure crops. Evidence of lack of appreciation of the importance of sod is visible on every hand. We see all too frequently cattle, sheep, hogs, and horses grazing off, very closely, the growth of grasses and legumes in the field to go into corn. This reduces the value of the sod by one-half, for the growth above ground should match the root system in volume.

4. Permanent pasture is a profitable crop even on the best of land. Many think permanent pasture is impossible. However, pastures that receive care and proper management will be very productive indefinitely. One pasture unplowed in forty-five years roused much interest and surprise, due to the great amount of grazing it afforded and still kept ahead of the herd. True it had been clipped once and needed it again, it had been limed and it had been top dressed with super-phosphate—at what a saving in labor costs and of grass seeding as compared with rotatoin fields seeded every three years, to say nothing of the much greater carrying capacity of the permanent pasture.

5. Water Conservation. Terraces where needed are used to slow water and to spread it to prevent damage. Such water soaks in and leaves the soil in place as well as lime, fertilizers and manure. Ditches, where heeded, removes excess water, lowers water table and makes possible much more effective tilage of crop land. Pasture furrow or control furrows do much to save water and therefore increase grazing capacity—also prevent run-off water doing damage by carrying erosive material from the slopes to cover fertile land on the flats below.

6. Strip cropping in which strips 100 feet to 150 in width are used to produce a three year rotation in repetition—such as wheat, hay, and corn and repeat so that run-off water from the corn strip is slowed and spread in the hay or wheat strips so that the fertile soil is filtered once and deposited along with lime, fertilizers and manure.

7. Contour farming or farming on the level is farming around the slopes or grades in contract to straight line farming up and down the slopes or grades characterized by check row planting of corn and two-way cultivation which while effective in one sense is very destructive to soil through stimulating and aiding soil wasting or erosion, which is soon followed by gullies. Contour farming, without strips, is in some cases sufficient to save soil if the grade or slope is very small.

One other fact should be stressed—viz., the importance of taking the simple control measures while there is still opportunity to do so. The tendency is to delay too long—this means more expense due to increased labor cost, less response to control measures, longer period of control at less production, therefore less production, therefore less satisfactory and less conserving. The use of contour farming is economical as well as effective in saving our most fundamental resource—the soil.
