Ruins of Prehistoric Koptos.

There is now on exhibition in London an interesting collection of antiquities found in recent excavations made on the site of Koptos in Egypt.

The ancient site of Koptos formed the Nile termination of the oldest trading route of the world, the roadway passing through the valley of Hammamat to the shores of the Red sea. According to tradition Koptos was one of the first settlements founded by the dynastic Egyptian immigrants when they arrived from their home in the sacred land of Punt in southwestern Arabia. Archæologists have looked, with hopes of obtaining valuable material, toward the site of Koptos. Prof. Petrie returned not long ago, after spending eleven weeks in excavations there, and the collection now on exhibition is a part of the result of his labors.

The site of the Temple of Koptos was thoroughly cleared, and the result was the discovery of no less than six successive temples, ranging from the most remote prehistoric time to the age of the Ptolemys. Hundreds of objects of great interest were discovered. Hitherto Egyptian art and civilization have presented a striking paradox. The further back one goes the better the art. In the lowest strata of the Temple of Koptos Prof. Petrie discovered the remains of an ancient settlement, which for the first time reveals prehistoric Egypt.

There is on exhibition in his collection a massive head of a statue, which is one of three figures found at a great depth beneath the Ptolemaic Temple. The statues themselves were thirteen feet high and were little more than truncated cones, the arms and legs being indicated by hammered-out lines, and the ears and whiskers were indicated in the same way. No trace of chisel work, however, can be found on any of them.

Scotch Fishing Villages.

From the Scottish Review.

Some of the fishing villages along the north and east seaboard of Scotland are singularly quaint and picturesque, Netherlandish almost in their details, worthy studies for a Luysdael or a Vandervelde. The rows of little split fish skewered on sticks or triangular lath frames nailed along the cottage walls are quite distinctive features. So also are the cottages themselves, with their vermilion pan tiled roofs and outlying stairways, but these are fast disappearing and giving place to a modern style of tenement, which makes one miss the old world forms and warm color. Well were it, however, if primitive dirt and archaic scavengering could in many cases make way for more modern sanitary arrangements.

The fisher folk of both sexes are very commonly of a serious, inscrutable cast of countenance, generated, I suppose, by the precarious nature and constant risks of their seafaring occupation. "It's no fish ye're buying," quoth the masterful Maggie to Monkbarns. "It's men's lives." The men do indeed carry their lives in their hands, and it were strange if this did not give a certain solemnity and God fearing set to their characters. The Eyemouth people still speak with bated breath of the terrible catastrophe which overtook them in the great storm or cyclone of some years back and turned well nigh every homestead into a house of mourning. The fisherman has a long memory for such visitations.

* * *

It is quite as unjust to deprive a man of a responsibility which belongs to him, and which he can rightly fulfill, as it is to defraud him of any other of his rights. Those who do this under the pretext of relieving him from burdens too great to bear do him an untold wrong. It is a selfish appropriation of power and authority, to the exclusion of justice and good feeling.

* * *

There are a great many persons who act as if they thought petty troubles were a luxury; and they seem never to be satisfied without them. They nurse their annoyances, and dandle them, as it were, on their knees, seeming determined to bring out of them all that they have in them.

* * *

To do your own work well, whether it be for life or death. To help other people at theirs when you can, and seek to avenge no injury. To be sure you obey good laws before you seek to alter bad ones,

* * *

It is always a sad thing to lose an ideal. However far we may be from attaining it, the test of our character lies in the loyalty with which we cherish it and the degree to which we strive to approach it.

* * *

Should misfortune overtake, retrench, work harder, but never fly; confront difficulties with unflinching perseverance. Should you then fail you will be honored; but shrink, and you will be despised.

* * *

We should practice temperance, if it were for nothing else but the very pleasure of it; it is the glory of a man that hath abundance, to live as reason, not as appetite directs.
