the churn or not. Then pretty soon she thought of another remark:

"That new fence you're putting up looks nice," she said. "You're getting your eighty fixed up awful fine this year.

"Yes, I've been trying to get it cleaned out a little," he said. And he glanced at her suspiciously, as if he thought she might have some hidden meaning.

"It doesn't look like the same place since you got the old hedges down and the house and barn painted," Crissie said. "You'll soon have it fixed fine enough for—"

Crissie hesitated. She felt it would be bad taste to mention Edith again.

"I'll soon have it fixed fine enough for what?" demanded Steve.

"Oh, nothing," said Crissie, awkwardly, "only I was just going to say you'd soon have it all ready for Edith to step right into!"

Steve regarded her frowningly a moment before he spoke. Then, "What are you talking to me about her for all the time?" he wanted to know. "I haven't got anything to do with her."

"Why, you took her to the fair!" said Crissie.

"Because I had to," said Steve. "She was visiting at our house, and she complained of having no way of going to the fair, and grandmother asked me before her if I wouldn't take her, and I said I would. That's how I come to do it. Anyway, you knew better than that, Crissie!" said Steve, almost sternly. He got up and stood right in front of her with nothing but the churn between them. "You knew which girl it was that I fixed up my farm for! You knew it wasn't Edith Ross!"

Crissie was frightened and she churned away very hard without saying anything. Steve put his hand on the dasher. "Don't churn so hard, Crissie," he said. "See, the butter has come. It don't need it. I want to talk to you."

Crissie tried to move the dasher, but she could not. Then she just stood there, looking down, and twisting the corner of her cream-bespattered apron. She felt very naughty and unworthy, though she hardly knew what she had done.

"It was on account of you I weeded out my eighty, Crissie!" Steve said. "You know it was because I was such a bad farmer that you gave me the mitten last spring; you know that that was the reason, Crissie!"

Crissie gave him a quick, astonished look. However in the world had he found that out? She was sure she had never told anyone outside her own family.

"It was all right of you to give me the mitten then, Crissie," Steve went on. "When I think of the way I used to farm I'll own up that you were right, though it about killed me at the time. It's made a man of me, too, for I'll never again be the kind of a farmer I was, whether you have me or not. But, Crissie, you haven't anything against me now, have you? You like me a little, I know you do, and you can't say any more that I raise more weeds than corn. Crissie, is my eighty nice enough for you now?"

Crissie wanted to yield, but she could not say yes simply and plainly like another girl.

While she was thinking about it Steve reached out his arm and drew her to him, creamy apron and all. The old Maltese approached the churn and licked the cream from the sides; then he stood upon his hind legs and licked the lid. He even gulped down the lumps of butter that had come up throught the hole. No doubt he wondered greatly what Crissie was about to let him do it, but Crissie had no eye for old Malty ust then.

She happened to catch a glimpse of Steve's face as he drew her to him, and something she saw there put a strange, new feeling in her heart. It was a feeling of wild, headlong adoration for Steve. She forgot all about being pert and saucy. She even grew tender for a moment. "I'll help you keep it nice—your eighty I mean!" she whispered.—Annie M. Burke.

Walking Backward Cure for Headache.

Medical Record.

An appostle of physical culture says that an excellent and never-failing cure for nervous headache is the simple act of walking backward. Ten minutes is as long as is usually necessary to promenade. It sometimes, however, requires more than ten minutes to walk at all, if one is very "nervous." But it is not understood that it is necessary to walk a chalkline. Any kind of walking will do, provided it is backward. It is well to get in a long, narrow room, where the windows are high, and walk very slowly, placing first the ball of the foot on the floor, and then the heel. Besides curing the headache, this exercise promotes a graceful carriage. A half hour's walk backward every day will do wonders toward producing a graceful gait.

Keep the manure pile steadily growing.

Advertising in the Drug Business.

Mr. M. Byerson contributes to the Bulletin of Pharmacy a paper on judicious advertising for the retail druggist, giving the following examples of what an effort of this kind has accomplished:

"J. C. Ayer began life as a drug clerk and advertising his Cherry Pectoral in a small way, but when he died he left a fortune estimated at $15,000,000. C. I. Hood began 'that tired feeling' in a small way in 1870, and is now rated as a millionaire. A. B. Scott, of Scott & Bowne, was working at a moderate salary twenty years ago; to-day his firm is spending $1,000,000 a year for advertising. Brent Good, proprietor of Carter's Little Liver Pills, started on a cash capital of $8.40, and now cannot spend the money he is making; and many others the same way. Judicious advertising has made it possible for Seabury & Johnson to spend annually $50,000 on popularizing their products, W. T. Hanson Company $500,000 on Pink Pills for Pale People, and Wells, Richardson & Company $600,000 on Paine's Celery Compound. Dr. A. L. Helmbold was at one time a retail druggist in Philadelphia. He finally began the manufacture of his Buchu Compound, and put his entire surplus capital of $2,000 into a contract for one month's advertising, and in a short time, comparatively, was enjoying a clear income of $150,000 per year, besides spending as high as $250,000 annually in advertising. Orange Judd, the publisher, owed his first success largely to the mistake of his office boy in ordering a page advertisement instead of a column, as instructed. Moses P. Handy, of the Chicago Times Herald, says: 'When I talk to a man who has made a fortune by advertising, I wonder that anybody who has anything to sell does not go and do likewise. One man told me a day or two ago that his concern, with a nominal capital of $160,000, only $30,000 of which was paid in, has divided in a single year among three partners profits to the amount of $750,000, and that exclusive of salaries of $50,000 and $25,000 drawn by two members of the firm. Ten or twelve years ago this man was a drug clerk on a small salary in a western town [I wonder if it was in Nebraska], and is now one of the millionaires of New York. Without advertising I might have made a living,' he said, 'but it was advertising that made me rich, and advertising a very simple commodity at that.' Another man, who bears similar testimony, tells me that his concern, which began by investing $10,000 a year in advertising, increased the amount every year according to the increase of business, and this year expects to spend $1,000,000. Still another, who confined himself entirely to the newspaper and magazine in the exploitation of his specialty, never having touched a dead wall, a fence, or the broad side of a barn with poster or paint brush, and never employing a salesman, has a cool million salted down in real estate, keeps a yacht, and spends most of the year abroad in luxurious living."

Horace Greeley.

An acquaintance met Horace one day and said: "Mr. Greely, I've stopped your paper." "Have you?" said Horace. "Well, that's too bad," and the old white hat went its way.

The next morning Greeley met his subscriber again, and said: "I thought you had stopped the Tribune?" "So I did." "Then there must be some mistake," said Horace, "for I just came from the office, and the presses were running, the clerks were as busy as ever, the compositors were hard at work, and the business was going on the same as yesterday and the day before." "Oh!" ejaculated the subscriber, "I didn't mean that I had stopped the paper, I stopped only my copy of it because I didn't like your editorials." "Pshaw!" retorted Greeley, "it wasn't worth taking up my time to tell me such a trifle as that. My dear sir, if you expect to control the utterances of the Tribune by the purchase of one copy a day, or if you think you find any newspaper worth reading that will never express convictions at right angles with your own, you are doomed to disappointment."

Asthma.

Tsakiris, Medical Record.

At the moment of the attack spray rapidly the back of the patient with chloride of methyl, from above downward and below upward. The attack will cease in a few moments; if not, spray lightly the upper part of the chest. If the skin be delicate, as in woman, cover the parts with a bit of fine gauze and make the strength of the spray proportionate to the strength of the patient and the violence of the attack.

If the farmer is out of debt he is much better off than the merchant and manufacturer who are in debt. There is comfort in that thought.

A large-sized orchard needs constant resetting in order to make it do its best.

OLD RUBBER SHOES.

From India Rubber World.

The business of gathering waste rubber is chiefly confined, so far, to cast-off foot-wear. The methods of reclaiming rubber were first applied to scrap of this class, and the organized channels through which 18,000 tons of scrap annually trickle from the hands of country peddlers into larger streams, until the rubber reclaiming factories receive it in car-load lots, have all been planned for the collection of old shoes. The price of old shoes at the point where they first become a merchantable commodity it would be hard to say. In many rural districts rubber shoes are collected in the spring months, together with rags and other waste, by peripatetic merchants whose stock in trade, whether in a pack or a little wagon, consists of tinware and cheap trinkets, intended for exchange at the farm house for the contents of the scrap bag. No cash changes hands in these transactions. When the peddler returns to his starting point he turns over his collections to the village merchant for more tinware, with perhaps a little cash, and goes out over a new route in quest of rags. The peddler may be in business on his own account, or in the employment of the village trader, but in either case the latter has a chance to make a profit on the collections of scrap, which are shipped from time to time to a city dealer. The latter will offer his rubber stock, whenever it reaches good proportions, to a rubber reclaiming mill. In shipments from the West probably 4 per cent. of the whole will consist of rubber scrap, 25 per cent of metal, and the rest of paper stock and rags. There is no one handling rubber shoes alone, however. Whoever buys the country merchants' collection must take the whole lot. But the rubber is the most prized part, in proportion to its extent, since the trade in rags for paper stock has been greatly depressed in recent years, while rubber scrap has gone upward in price, with the increased number of rubber reclaiming factories and the consequent competition in the business. It may be noted that, when old shoes first became a merchantable article the price paid for them by manufacturers was one cent per pound, while the quotations have since averaged 5 cents per pound for months at a time.

The trade in rubber scrap is now most thoroughly organized in the West and Northwest. In the Southern States, where little snow falls, the consumption of rubber shoes is not sufficient to form a basis for a trade in old shoes. Even in New York City, the use of rubbers is not large enough, in proportion to the population, to make the trade in scrap of importance. The rubber reclaiming works formerly received considerable shipments from Canada, but that was before the establishment of factories in the Dominion for working up old shoes. Of the rubber scrap imported the larger share comes from Russia. The imported scrap is not as desirable, however, as what is gathered at home. In spite of the good consumption of rubber foot wear in New England, there are no dealers in scrap there in a position of commanding importance. This is due in part to the existence of near-by factories which buy directly from the smaller dealers. In the West the principal center of the trade is Chicago.
