NOVEMBER.

The old year's withered face is here again,
The twilight look, the look of reverie,
The backward-gazing eyes that seem to see
The full-leaved robin-haunted June remain
Through devastating wind and ruinous rain,
A form that moves a little wearily,
As one who treads the path of memory
Beneath a long year's load of stress and stain.
Good-night! good-night! the dews are thick and damp,
Yet still she babbles on, as loath to go,
Of apple buds and blooms that used to be,
Till Indian summer brings the bedtime lamp,
And underneath a covering of snow
She dreams again of April ecstasy.

JULIET'S COURAGE.

From the New York News.

The level sunset was turning all the little pools along the shingly beach into drops of gold.

"It's very nice," said Mrs. Elton plaintively, as she sat on the long piazza of the hotel, "but I should have preferred some inland place for the summer. You see, I am never at ease about the children, and Mr. Elton comes down here only once in the week."

"Your brother seems to enjoy the beauties of the seashore very much," said Mrs. Dorsey. "I think I never saw Mr. Seville enjoying better spirits."

"Oh, that's because Miss Chaloner is here," said the matron, curving her lip a little superciliously. "He is absurdly infatuated with Juliet Chaloner!"

"I think she ir a very lovely girl," said Mrs. Dorsey.

"Lovely? Oh, yes, I suppose she is lovely enough, only I never did fancy that style of beauty.

"Mr. Seville does, it seems."

"My dear, didn't I tell you that Clarence was completely infatuated? I don't suppose he would be willing to own that she has a fault in the world. I did talk to him seriously at one time, about those coquetish little airs of hers, but I saw at once that I might as well have talked to the wind. You see, I think she is disposed to be selfish—those only daughters often are; and then she is such an egregious coward!"

"How do you mean?"

"She won't ride, lest she should be run away with; she is terrified out of her senses at the apparition of a mouse, and I wish you could have heard her scream the other day, when a spider dropped on her bonnet. I've no patience with such a character."

"Perhaps it is only a bit of girlish affection."

"No, it is not; she actually is afraid."

"There she comes now, with your children clinging around her," said Mrs. Dorsey. "They certainly appear to be very fond of her."

"Yes," returned Mrs. Elton, indifferently, "she has a way of winning children's affectation.

As Juliet Chaloner came up the path, her slight figure darkly outlined against the sunset, her beauty seemed something more intangible.

One little one clung to her skirts, another held her hand, and two or three skipped along in front of her as she neared the piazza.

"Mamma! mamma!" piped out little Hubert, "Miss Chaloner has promised to go to Blyden's Point with us tomorrow—where the little twisted shells grow.

"And, mamma," interrupted Rosa, "You'll go with us, for Miss Chaloner says you can find those star-fish for your aquarium!"

"Don't talk so loud children," said Mrs. Elton, pettishly. "I'm afraid you've found them very noisy and troublesome, Miss Chaloner."

"Not at all," said Juliet, pleasantly. "I am very fond of children, you know. And I really think, Mrs. Elton, you would find it a very pleasant walk to Blyden's Point."

"Thank you," said the matron, stiffly, "it would be altogether too far."

"Then, mamma," urged Harry Elton, a manly boy of 14, "let me row you, Rosa and Herbert in the boat."

"I'll think of it," said Mrs. Elton; "Only if Miss Chaldner should chance to encounter a spider or a field mouse by the road, I won't answer for the consequences."

Juliet laughed, but she colored nevertheless.

"I was telling Clarence of your dainty little hysterics," went on Mrs. Elton, with polite malice. "If there is anything Clarence respects it is common sense and courage."

Juliet went into the house without replying.

"Does Clarence think I am a coward, or does he think me guilty of affectation?" she thought. "What have I done that Mrs. Elton should speak so unkindly to me?"

"Mamma," said Harry, bluntly, "Why did you speak to Miss Chaloner so spitefully?"

"Little boys shouldnt ask questions!" said Mrs. Elton, sharply. "Go in and brush your hair!"

"So you have really concluded to go to Blyden's Point with us?" said Juliet, brightly, as she met Mrs. Elton at the dinner-table next day.

"Yes, to please the children."

"And, Miss Chaloner," interposed Harry. "I am to row mamma and the little ones, while you walk across the sands and meet us, at 5 o'clock."

"Then we must start a little in advance of your boating party," said Juliet.

How brightly the golden afternoon slipped away upon the smooth sands of Blyden's Point! Even Mrs. Elton forgot to be spiteful, but reveled in the beauty of the far off rocks and sapphire firmament, and owned to herself that really, Juliet Chaloner was very charming!"

"See, Miss Chaloner!" cried Bessie, ecstatically dancing upon her tip-toes, "the water is creeping all over my shells!"

"Don't you see the tide is coming up?" said Harry, eagerly. "Stand up on that high points and take your shells away quick unless you want to lose them."

"But Miss Chaloner," said Helen wistfully, "the water is ever so high over that narrow neck of land, where we crossed by the old lighthouse; how shall we get back again?"

Juliet laid down the branch of seaweed she had been admiring with Mrs. Elton, and looked off towards the rising tide with a cheek suddenly blanching.

"Miss Chaloner, what is the matter?" shrieked Mrs. Elton.

"We are cut off from the mainland," said Juliet in a low voice. "The tide is coming up, and half an hour from now this point will be submerged. Why did we not think of that? The boat, Harry — quick!"

"But, Miss Chaloner," pleaded thoughtful Bessie, "if we were to run — the water is surely not higher than our waists."

"My dear, the neck of land is half a mile away, and the tide is rising at a fearful rate. Get in the boat, Mrs. Elton."

"Mamma! mamma!" wailed the children in chorus, while Mrs. Elton, pale and trembling, and incapable of effort, sat on the rock.

"I cannot move," she stammered. "I really think that I am going to faint."

But even while the words were on her lips, Juliet's arm encircled her waist and Juliet's strength guided her to the little boat that lay rocking on the waves.

It was very small, containing but two seats, and when Mrs. Elton and her five children were ensconced therein, every nook in it was occupied.

"There is no room for Miss Chaloner!" cried Harry.

Mrs. Elton looked feebly around. "Give me Rosa—let me hold Rosa in my lap," she faltered, scarcely knowing what she said.

But Juliet unloosed the loop of rope that fastened the boat to a projecting rock, and flung it out upon the waves.

"The boat is overloaded already," she said, in a calm voice. "Push off Harry."

The generous heart of the boy rose up with a choking throb.

"Miss Chaloner! and leave you here to perish?"

"Listen, Harry," she said hurriedly, "Row home as fast as you can. Two hours will take you there, and then — then you can send the boat for me."

And as the words trembled on her tongue, Juliet Chaloner glanced over her shoulder at the white-crested fringes of foam slowly creeping up the sands, and knew that, two hours from that time, it would all be one wild tossing mass of waves!

Slowly the black outline of the boat faded into indistinctness, growing less and less.

The sun hung above the sea, while the blue cloudless sky smiled overhead. Nature was full of soft repose and yet Juliet stood with clasped hands and silent endurance waiting for the death which was drawing nearer and nearer—the stern, restless death whose horrors never seemed so ghastly as now."

"And he will be at home here tonight," she murmured. "My God! my God!"

The thunder of the cruel waves was in her ears—the moaning of the surf and she knew no more.

"Send a boat back to Blyden's Point?" echoed the old boatman.

"Bless my heart, sir! Blyden's Point is seven feet under the water by this time!"

"And Miss Chaloner?" shrieked Mrs. Elton.

"The Lord have mercy on her soul!" solemnly uttered the old man, taking of his cap.

"Oh, Juliet! Juliet!" gasped Mrs. Elton, wringing her hands, "what shall a say to my brother when he asks for you?"

The soft light of a shaded lamp fell across Juliet Chaloner's eyes, as she opened them with a vague sense of having passed through a wild troubled dream.

"Where am I?" she murmured. "You here, Clarence?"

"My love," tenderly responded the well known tones.

"But how came I here?" she asked, shuddering, as she remembered the sands and the water.

Then Clarence Seville told her how, coming from the nearest railway station by boat, instead of the stage route, he had caught sight of a white object on the sands at Blyden's Point. Bidding the boatmen row up to it with all possible speed, he found himself just in time to rescue her from death.

"God's hand guided me there dearest," he said impressively. "My noble girl! were it possible to love you better than I did before, this act of self-sacrifice would move me to do so."

From that hour Mrs. Elton cherished and reverenced Miss Chaloner as if she had been a saint; for to her there seemed something more than human in the noble self-abnegation of Juliet's courage!

The Weather and Disease.

The Lancet, London.

Poets and writers in all ages have made reference to the effects which changes of the weather produce in the human organism, and the archives of folk-lore would furnish much evidence that these effects have not passed unnoticed by the proletariat. Unfortunately, however, the subject has been adulterated with a great deal of superstition, which has in a great measure tended to retard intelligent inquiry. That the various atmospheric changes should have some effect upon our bodies is easily understood, for we know that alteration in the surface temperature, a change in the blood pressure or in the air pressure of the lungs, may affect the nervous system, and all these changes may be brought about by some peculiarity of the natural phenomena which we call weather. In recent years the suciect has attracted attention by those most competent to deal with the matter, and lately a meteorlogical station has been attached to the laboratories of the public health department at Rome, where lectures are given to students on the application of meteorology to hygene. At present our knowledge of the way in which the weather acts upon the body is very limited, and must remain so until a larger number of data is collected. An attempt to trace the relation between weather and disease has recantly been made by a fellow of the Royal Meterological Society by bringing together a number of statistics dealing with the phenomena of the weather and some well known diseases, chiefly zymotic, presenting them by a graphic method in a systematic manner. Little attempt has been made to draw conclusions from these statistics, and until they have been digested by many minds perhaps the writer was wise in his omission. There are few people who could not give instances of the influence which the weather has upon them, either mentally or physically, and there are many medical men (who in other directions have no opportunity for original research) who might do some useful work by recording the result of their observations on the subject, and thus add considerably to our knowledge of the role which is played by the weather in the causation or prevention of disease. On some constitutions the seasons have a marked influence. With many the spring, with its bright days and clear air, is felt to be the time of the year when they get the most enjoyment from life; while others, probably of a more sensitive temperament, experience the greatest sum of happiness and health when peaceful autumn wraps them in its serene atmosphere. On the other hand, winter or summer, as the case may be, produces in other temperaments the greatest consummation of healthy vitality. Certain changes in the weather, too, tend to increase or diminish the amount of energy that we put into our daily work, and it has been stated that in a large factory from ten to twenty per cent. less work is done on dull days and days of threatening storm. The whole subject is one which, pursued in a proper scientific spirit, should be productive of useful results.

Gather the apples carefully and sort them over so that no bruised ones be packed in the barrels to decay and damage the others.

Improvement in breed is useless, unless there is a corresponding improvement in the methods of feeding and caring for the finer stock.
