TALKING IN THEIR SLEEP.

"You think I am dead."
The apple tree said,
"Because I have never a leaf to show,
Because I stoop
And my branches droop
And the dull, gray mosses over me grow,
But I'm alive in trunk and shoot,
The buds of next May
I fold away,
But I pity the withered grass at my root."

"You think I am dead,"
The quick grass said,
"Because I have parted with stem and blade,
But under the ground
I am safe and sound,
With the snow's thick blanket over me laid,
I'm all alive and ready to shoot
Should the spring of the year
Come dancing here,
But I pity the flower without branch or root."

"You think I am dead,"
A soft voice said,
"Because not a branch or root I own,
I never have died,
But close I hide
In a plumy seed that the wind has sown,
Patient I wait through the long winter hours,
You will see me again,
I shall la igh at you then
Out of the eyes of a hundred flowers."

Select Story.

HER CONFESSION.

From the London Mail.

Long after the speaker's words had died away the listening people waited in hushed expectancy, unwilling to believe that he had finished and unable to descend all at once from the heights to which they had been raised.

John Ordway and his wife came from the chapel among the last. Both had been strongly moved by the evening's sermon, but in different ways, indicative perhaps of their widely differing temperaments.

Ordway helped his wife into the wagon, the horse struck into a swift trot, and the driver leaned forward to draw the rug more closely about his companion, peering up into her face solicitously.

They moved swiftly past the scattered houses of the village and out into a stretch of open country. Three or four times the woman raised her head as though about to speak, but checked herself with an effort.

"I have something to tell you John," she said at last. "I—I am afraid I ought to have told you long ago."

"Are ye sure ye ought?" he asked gently. "Maybe there ain't any need."

"There is a need," she answered. "I have known all along that it would be better to speak out, but somehow I never felt that I could until to-night." She paused as though to gather courage. "It's about myself and Willis," she said. "You remember"—

Ordway bent forward suddenly with a warning shout to the horses, and the wagon jolted heavily in a deep rut.

"That's me all over," he said, with a chuckle. "I took special notice of that hole so as to skip it on the way home, and here I am driven right into it again, like an old fool. That's what comes of listenin' to ser—ye can't quite understand."

"Won't you listen to me, John?" she pleaded pleadingly.

"I will," he answered, "I s bein' so wrought up d to have any big e sudden, ye know." is arm and her oser t go in together," she said.

The long, low kitchen was full of changing shadows, which danced across the time polished floor and lost themselves in the corners of the irregular ceiling, when Ordway crossed to the huge fireplace and piled some sticks of soft wood on the glowing ashes. At length she spoke slowly and with evident effort at calmness.

"You must try to be patient with me," she said. "You'll be astonished, I know, and I am afraid you'll be angry—and I couldn't blame you, but I want you to wait till—till I've finished."

She hesitated as if to gain strength, and he marked how the slender figure quivered with the effort of her hurried breathing.

"I had promised to marry Willis before I knew you, "she said unsteadily. "We quarreled about some little thing, and each was too proud to speak first. Finally he went away without seeing me. You know how we heard that he died in Africa. I believed it—we all did—and I cried myself to sleep night after night because I hadn't acted differently.

"Little by little, and after awhile it all seemed like a sort of dream. Then you came into my life and taught me to trust you and turn to you for help in everything. And in truth, I loved you more than you could ever understand." Her voice trembled. "You believe me, John?" she asked. "Say that you do believe me."

"I ain't never doubted it," he answered softly.

"I was happy and contented for two long years. It was like heaven, and you were happy, too, John?"

"Happy!" he said. "Ah, Yes! Nobody'll ever know how much."

"And then little Dora was born," she went on, 'and somehow all our trouble began right there, for it seemed as though her baby hands took hold of our hearts and pushed them apart, a little at first and then more and more. Well, things got worse and worse, and when she died I almost believed you were to blame in some way—I don't know how. Oh, its awful to think about, but I couldn't help feeling that way! Will you ever forgive me for it?"

"I never laid it up against ye," he answered. "I reckoned it was natural, and I knew ye wasn't well, so I tried to forget all about that part of our life, and I done it—almost."

"The rest of the story is harder to tell and harder to listen to. You remember that Willis came back and hunted us up. He came at the worst time for all of us. I was set against you and half wild about baby's death and reckless to everything. He found that out and kept pleading with me and urging me to go away with him. I ought to have sent him away, but I—didn't. It was as though some evil spirit put the words into his mouth, and I listened—God help me, I listened."

She started to her feet and stood facing her husband, her arms raised to her head in a wild gesture.

"It was no fault of mine that I did not sin against you indeed as I did in thought!" she cried. "If it had not been for some accident—I don't even know what it was—I should not have been here now. I went to meet him here one night. We were to drive to Oakley and take the train for some place. I waited, I don't know how many hours, but he didn't come. At last I crept home and found you asleep. In the morning when you were away a letter came saying that an unforeseen accident had happened, and he would let me know about it soon. I never heard from him again."

She paused and looked at him fearfully, as though expecting a violent outburst of anger, but he said nothing, and at last she spoke again.

"Won't you speak to me?" she cried tremulously. "Haven't you been listening? Have I done wrong to tell you? Speak to me, for God's sake! I can't bear it."

The words were lost in a storm of sobbing, and she threw herself down on her knees beside him, hiding her face with her hands on the arm of the old fashioned chair.

"Don't take on so, Eunie," he said gently. "Ye'll be glad all the rest of yer life, I think, on account of jest what ye're cryin about now. Look up, my girl, an' maybe I can finish the story for ye. Ye say ye never knowed why he didn't come that night," he said. "I could a-told ye why."

"You?" she cried.

"Yes," he answered. "Jest me. He stayed away because I told him I better, and he knowed I meant I said.

d ye think I was so blind all onths that I didn't see what " I'd a-knowed it if I les away, for there ain't trouble in yer heart but on't feel it. I jest stepped to Willis. He under- t settled it."

've known?" she inter- blessly. "You've known heerfully. "All this said a word to me —you never acted as though"—

"It's always harder for me to talk than to keep still," he said slowly. "Surely ye've found that out long ago. I couldn't a-said a word without making things worse, most likely so I thought the best thing to do was to jest wait—an I've been waitin."

"Waiting!" she repeated. "Waiting for what?"

"For what happened, Eunie," he said softly.

The woman was clinging to his arm and weeping convulsively.

"'Tweren't yer fault, little girl," he said. 'It's jest happened that way. There ain't no need to cry about it now. The time for cryin's all gone past, an I don't think it'll ever come again."

HOW FIRE CAUSES DEATH.

From the Scientific American.

A writer in the Hospital says: Those who lose their lives in conflagration do not by any means always suffer physical pain. In many cases, no doubt, sharp terror is the one thing of which the victim is conscious, and in many more, strange as it may seem, consciousness slips out a struggle.

In great conflagrations gases are produced which have much the same effect (as chloroform or similar anesthetics), and it is a fact that of those who lose their lives in such catastrophes a considerable proportion pass into death without any evidence of having suffered. This result is produced especially when a fire has smouldered, when the access of air has at first been sufficient to cause complete combustion, and when that deadly gas, carbonic oxide, has cent its victims into lethal sleep before the actual flames have reached them.

Of those, however, who have evidently struggled and fought, and whose charred corpses are afterward found in attitudes suggestive of violent efforts made in attempting to escape it must not be imagined that they have of necessity been burned alive and have died in the agony which such contortions are popularly imagined to express.

Death from agony is really death from shock, a condition in which the body is limp and helpless; whereas in death from suffocation struggling may go on even after consciousness has passed, and the strained attitude of the corpse may be expressive only of the final paroxysmal effort made in a state of entire unconsciousness.

Suffocation in a fire depends on something more than mere carbonic acid poisoning. It is the stoppage of the breathing by the stifling vapors which does the mischief. Carbonic acid would doubtless kill if it could be breathed, but anyone who has attempted to enter a burning building will know that suffocation depends, not on the stuff one breathes, but on the fact that one cannot breathe at all. The lungs are as much deprived of their supply of oxygen as if the sufferer were plunged over head in water, and the struggle produced is much the same.

While then we must admit the horror of the moment, the terror, the fight for breath, and finally the death from suffocation, we must remember that all this is often a matter of short duration, and that it is something very different from the slow torture of being burned alive.

The writer reminds us that, owing also to the excitement of the moment, the body of one who is in a great fire is probably insensible to pain, just as is often is in battle. He says:

The instances are so frequent in which more or less severe and painful wounds have only been discovered after the necessity for action had passed away that we are driven to hope and to believe that so long as all the energies are absorbed in the effort to escape, actual suffering, even from fire, may not be great—may even be unfelt.

Yet there is another, and not so comforting, side to the picture. Says the writer:

It must be recognized that, while all this is true, there are cases in which people are actually burned alive—consumed little by little until the heart stops from shock.

Familiar pictures of martyrs at the stake show us one of the conditions for such an event; the wind driving the smoke aside so that the head, the brain, and thus the consciousness, are left intact until the heart is stopped by sheer agony.

It must always be remembered that no one can live or retain consciousness when actually within the flames. But those who are caught and held fast in the full blast of fresh air which is being drawn into the center of the conflagration cannot be suffocated, they cannot make those violent efforts which would numb their consciousness of pain; they can but wait and suffer until as the result of agony or terror, let us hope the latter, their hearts stand still. This is indeed a terrible fate.

A physician advertised that, at the request of his friends, he had removed near the churchyard, and trusted that his removal would accommodate many of his patients.

"Saved Her Life."

MRS. JOHN WALLET, of Jefferson, Wis., the subject of whom none is more highly esteemed or widely known, writes. "In 1890 I had a severe attack of LaGrippe and at the end of four months, in spite of all physicians and friends and good nursing could do, my lungs, heart and nervous system were so completely wrecked, my life was despaired of. My friends giving me up. I could only sleep by the use of opiates. My lungs and heart pained me terribly and my cough was most aggravating. I could not lie in one position but a short time and not on my left side at all. My husband brought me Dr. Miles' Nervine and Heart Cure and I began to get better from the first bottle and by the time I had taken a half dozen bottles of each I was much better and continuing them. When I had taken a half dozen bottles persistently I took about a dozen bottles and was completely restored to health to the surprise of all."

CUT THIS OUT.

The Scientific American gives this receipt, which the whole world ought to know: "At the first indication of diphtheria in the throat of a child make the room close then take a cup and pour into it a quantity of tar and turpentine, equal; then hold the cup over the fire so as to fill the room with fumes. The little patient on inhaling the fumes will cough up and spit out the membranous matter and the diphtheria will pass out. The fumes of the tar and turpentine loosen the matter in the throat and thus afford the relief that has baffled the skill of physicians."

The Chicago Times-Herald can give a good answer to almost any question. When the Denver Post wondered why the cartoonists always represent Uncle Sam with trousers much too short for him, it said: "The trousers are long enough, but the old man's legs have been pulled so often that they are now really longer than they ought to be."

A lawyer said to a witness, "You have a plentiful supply of sap in your head," to which the witness replied, "the brass in your face is so plentiful, that you can spare enough to make a pail to hold it.

An Irishman, a short time since, bid an extraordinary price for an alarm clock, and gave as a reason, that as he loved to rise early, he had nothing to do but to pull the string, and he could wake himself.

An old gentleman being refused by a girl whom he wished to marry, was told that he was refused because he had asked a Miss.

A blind man having a shrew for a wife was told that she was a rose." I doubt it not," replied he, "for I feel the thorns daily."

A domestic informed his master that the house was on fire. "Tell your mistress of it," said he, "for I do not meddle in household affairs."

Wall Paper! Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a potter pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store, therefore I have no opposition. If you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollarin wall paper.

Finest and Cheapest Lines of WALL PAPER
