Select Poetry.

General Lawton.

Lay flowers fair upon his grave,
A tribute to the good and brave,
And drop thereon a crystal tear,
For him who never knew a fear.

His was the Warrior's life,
From home and friends to go,
And fight and conquer in the strife,
No difference who the foe.

His country was his foremost thought,
Himself and safety last.
For her he nobly bled and fought,
For her he never shrunk a task.

His battles all are o'er at last,
In victory's arms he sleeps,
He finished well his 'lotted task,
For him a nation weeps.

His battles o'er, his victory's won,
His deeds of valor all well done,
He now rests on that peaceful shore,
Where strife and conflict all are o'er.

Eldersburg, Md.

Select Story.

Between Trains.

"It is nonsense, Rob, you are imagining you are in love and wanting to get married just when you are getting a start in business and need all the capital you can command, and you shouldn't have your mind taken up with love and such things. Just wait a few years and you will find that I am right," and the old man brushed a fly from his gray beard.

"But, grandfather, I am not the only one to be considered; there is Dora, she loves me, and I don't care for business or anything if I have to give her up," the young man said impetuously.

"Tut! Tut, my boy! Love is all right in story books, but in everyday life there is not much of it; and Dora will get over it; don't you fear."

"You were married."

"Yes, yes; because your grandmother was a home body, and was necessary to my comfort; she wanted a home and I wanted a housekeeper and we understood each other and never regretted our compact; and we were as happy together as though we had wasted a lot of nonsense and time over love."

The young man looked surprised.

"There's your train, Rob; think it over, and I hope you won't make a young fool of yourself. Good-bye; take good care of yourself and write to the old man often," and there was a huskiness in his voice.

The young man took the old man's hand in a warm clasp.

"You be careful getting on and off the trains, grandfather; I do not like to see you traveling alone." Then he sprang on the train, and the old man was left alone on the platform of the dreary little country station.

"A beastly place to have to wait nearly four hours," he mutterad as limped into the waiting-room.

"Beg pardon, madam," he exclaimed, as he bumped against a little old lady who was turning away from the window of the ticket office. "I hope I didn't hurt you. I am not as nimble as I was fifty years ago; and this foot of mine will turn sometimes."

"Fifty years make a difference in people," the old lady answered in a low, sweet voice, and a smile lit up the wrinkled face under the frame of white hair. "I cannot get along as fast myself as I did at one time." Then she sat down inside one of the windows, and opening an old-fashioned traveling bag took out her knitting, while the old man went out and walked up and down the platform.

But there was nothing to see there, excepting the green fields of corn on the other side of the track, and the country town half a mile away.

After awhile he came in and sat down beside the old lady, resting his gold-headed cane on the iron rods separating the seats.

"Rather tiresome waiting here," he said. Are you going far?"

"Just to Dalton. I have been all winter with my daughter Alice, but she is getting company, and said I should go up to John's awhile." A sigh escaped her and an anxious look came into the faded blue eyes.

"Not a pleasant prospect," the old man said, looking at her intently.

The old lady started. "Oh, I didn't mean anything!" she exclaimed: "they are kind to me. I spend part of my time at one place and part at the other. Yes, they are kind to me. Have you a family?"

"A daughter and a son and a grand son whose parents are dead; he just took the up train. It seems to me there is something about you which seems familiar. I must have met you some place before, but I can't place you," the old man said.

"I am Mrs. Bowman, and you—you—you can't be Teddy—Tom Marsden?" she exclaimed, suddenly dropping the knitting into her lap; her face flushed and she glanced up in an embarrassed way.

"I must be the person, but they call me Colonel now, and you must be Jane, for no one called me Teddy excepting mother and you."

"The old man suddenly sprang to his feet and looked down at her.

"Well, well, who would have thought it?" Then he limped over and looked out of the opposite window; but presently he came back and sat down again.

"It's rather a dreary place to wait so long; not much accommodations on these branch roads," he said in a constrained tone.

"It is tiresome, and I always dislike the long wait here, so I usually bring some work along to help pass the time," she answered, glancing down at her knitting.

The old man was silent for a few minutes, while he watched the needles go back and forth.

"Do you remember that green silk purse you made for me once?" he asked at last.

"Haven't you forgotten that?" she laughed.

"No, I haven't and the first time I used it was the day we went to the picnic at Windon Grove, and——"

He suddenly stopped in a confused way.

The old lady's face grew scarlet.

"You remember things well; that was about"—she paused a moment—"fifty-three years or more ago.

"It is a good thing to have a good memory in some ways, but there are things that are better forgotten. That Windon picnic and what happened afterwards is one of the things in my life, Colonel Marsden." Her tone had a decisive ring in it, while she met his glance with a defiant look in the blue eyes.

The old man's face flushed and he fingered the top of his cane nervously.

"Jane, I don't blame you at all," he began hesitatingly. "I have often thought I would like to see you and—and let you know that I was not to blame as much as you think. I never got your letter for over twenty-five years after you sent it. Here it is now," he drew out a large leather pocketbook and took a yellow paper from one of the inner pockets. "Do you remember that John Slater that clerked for Black and generally tended to the mails. He was a tall, red-headed fellow, with lots of freckles. He gave met his once when he met me in New York. It had slipped down inside the desk or somewhere, and was not found for years, not until long after Black was dead and they were making some repairs to the building.

"We had a lot of business together, but I never recognized him until one day he asked me if I had not come down one summer to see you. Then he told me about the letter and hunted it up for me. That is why I never came again. I thought you would not forgive me."

"Why, Teddy!" Was all the old lady could say, but there was a quaver in her voice. "He told me," the old man continued, "that you had married and gone away and he did not know what had become of you?"

"I did not get married for ten years. Charles was good to me, but he didn't live long, and I had a pretty hard time of it for awhile; both of my children were small, but I got them educated. John is a doctor at Dalton and Alice is married well. I am going to John's now. I don't care very much for it. His wife is kind enough, but she is great for style, and you know sometimes old folks are in the way;" she smiled sadly.

"I know all about it," he said, knowingly. "I married to have a home. My wife was a good housekeeper. I did not love her; yes, I did my duty, and I missed her when she died five years ago. I didnt want to break up my home, and didn't, for I had Rob with me, but now they want the old man to break up, and I guess I will have to. I have plenty to live on, but they are uneasy about me, but I don't want to. I never feel right even if I make them a long visit. They are kind, but you feel sort of strange and can't have things just as you want them. Things might have been so different if—if I had just got that letter."

"Yes, that's so, but it's no use fretting over things now. I am glad we met, as I used to think hard of you. It must be nearly time for that train," the old lady said, taking up her knitting.

"It's an hour yet."

Then the old man walked over to the window again.

Presently he came back and stood before her.

"Janey," he began, then gave a little cough, "your children don't need you, and I have no one, and I get lonely, and why shouldn't we get married yet? We'd be company for each other, and—and—I have cared for you all these years. Maybe you don't believe it, but I have. If you knew how I have kept that letter, and I want you as much as I ever did," he said, pleadingly.

"Why, Teddy, we are so old. I am past seventy, and I am rheumatic, and John's wife says I am old and cranky."

"I am older than you are by some years; I am lame and can't get along without a cane; but, dear, won't you have me anyway?" The old man's voice trembled and he held out his arms.

Presently the station agent opened the door and saw a tall white-haired old man holding an old lady in his arms—her head resting against his shoulder while her black bonnet was hanging around her neck by the strings; and he heard the old man say:

"I wonder what Rob will say? I tried to talk him out of being in love just this morning. He thinks the old man knows nothing about it."

OUR ECHO.

You remember the story of the boy who went out into the woods and cried out "Hello!" and echo said "Hello!" The boy got mad, thought he was being made fun of, and he said, "I hate you!" Echo said "I hate you!" His anger increased, and he cried out, "I'll hit you!" Again Echo says "I'll hit you!" The little fellow, indignant, went into the house and told his mother that a boy out in the woods was going to hit him, and that he hated him, and so on. The mother saw the secret and said to him. "Now, my son, if you will go out into the woods and cry out 'I love you,' you will find that the boy will say he loves you." So out he went and said, "I love you!" and Echo immediately replied "I love you!" When we go out into the church, into the world, with this life of love in us producing harmony of all our faculties, we can project into our environments of circumstances this life of love, and by it make men love us, and beget in the lives of men this life of love.

MODERN CAVE DWELLERS.

Cave dwellers, or, to be exact, earth or rock dwellers, are not yet extinct. A traveler who visited the prehistoric cave dwellings near Halberstadt, in the Harz mountains, found in the nearby village of Langenstein ten caves hewn in the rock and occupied by 40 persons. This little settlement is built on the slope of a rocky hill near the village. The fronts of the dwellings were made by cutting a vertical face in the rock. Each "house" has a door and one window. The first house was constructed only 40 years ago by a young married couple who were too poor to pay their rent in the village. The rock houses are warm in winter and cool in summer. They are quite healthful, according to the testimony of their inhabitants, whose stout limbs and red checks vouch for the truth of their statements.

WHERE THE PRESIDENTS ARE BURIED.

The burial-places of our Presidents are widely scattered. Washington lies at Mount Vernon; the two Adamses are buried under the old church at Quincy, Mass.; Jefferson rests at Monticello; Madison's grave is at Montpelier, not far from Monticello; Monroe's remains lie in the Richmond Cemetery; Jackson's grave is in front of his old residence, "The Hermitage"; Van Buren was buried at Kinderhook; Harrison at North Bend, near Cincinnati; Polk at Nashville; Taylor's remains are near Louisville; Fillmore lies in Forest Lawn Cemetery, Buffalo; Pierce was buried in Concord and Buchanan at Lancaster. Lincoln's grave is near Springfield, Johnson's at Greenville, Garfield's at Cleveland, Grant's at Riverside and Arthur's at Albany.

Wall Paper! Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a pointer pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store, therefore I have no opposition. If you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.

Finest and Cheapest Lines of WALL PAPER
