LITTLENESS.

A little bit of sorrow
And a little bit of fun;
A little bit of resting
And a little bit of run.

A little bit of laughter
And a little bit of weep;
A little bit of waking

A little bit of hoping

A little bil of lonesome

Where's the use of kicking

A SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY AND ITS RESULTS.

BY GILBERT DAYLY.

From Mainly About People.

It was about 4 o'clock one afternoon in February, and Hippesley was sitting on the veranda of the Cafe de Paris at Monte Carlo. He sat deep in thought, his ears mechanically listening to the strains of the little Hungarian band a few yards away from him. He was thinking of the reason that had brought him to the place. He had been abroad for 12 years, yet within a month of his return he had left again and hurried to spend a few days on the Riviera before taking steamer at Marseilles.

It was absurd, he knew it, but the longing to see her face again was irresistible. He would not seek an opportunity of speaking with her. The scheme on which their lives had been worked out made this impossible. He simply had an overwhelming desire to see her. Then he could go back to his lonely life, not happy; he could never be that, but with a fresh picture of the one woman he had ever loved.

He noticed a smart carriage draw up before the broad steps of the Casino, and almost simultaneously a man and a woman came out of the building. The man was middle aged, a trifle heavy in build and faultlessly dressed. He handed the lady into the carriage. Hippesley, as he caught sight of her face, gave a start and clutched hold of the table. She was a young English woman, magnificently beautiful.

The color left his face, and he riveted his eyes on her. He watched her smilingly say "goodby" to the man on the steps; then the carriage turned and drove rapidly away. As it vanished from sight he sank back in his chair, his mouth twitching. His throat seemed dry and parched; he stretched forward and drank some tea at a gulp. Then the voices of two men talking just behind him reached his ears.

"That was the Princess Zandra. She is living at the Villa Erondel, at Beaulieu."

"Enormously rich?"

"She was till a day or so ago." The man lowered his voice. Hippesley found himself straining for the next words. "I happen to know," came in almost a whisper, "that the late prince was sufficiently ill advised to invest nearly all his money in an enterprise that has recently come to the ground with a crash, and the princess, who never had the slightest suspicion of her affairs not being in a satisfactory state, has suddenly been told that another year at her present rate of expenditure will leave her penniless."

"What will she do?"

"Go on living as she has done and marry again. Women with such beauty can pick and choose. There are no hard places for them. Rumor says it will be the man who has just left her. He is not a good man, but he is passionately in love with her and a millionaire twice over."

Hippesley rose from his seat and, making his way round to the terrace,
