VACATION.

Somber gloom enwraps the household—
All is desolate and still;
Not a sound to break the silence,
Not an echo on the hill.
Why the house so clean and quiet
All the long and lonely day?
Space suggests "It is vacation
And the children are away."

Gone to gran'ma's for a visit;
In our house cannot be found
Half-dressed dolls, nor bal s. nor marbles,
No menageries scattered round;
Now the fun is all at gran'ma's
And our house is dull to-day.
Order reigned where ruled confusion,
For the children are away.

No bonnets in a corner,
Jumping ropes now jump no more,
Broken wagons, bits of harness
Do not litter up the floor;
Solitude and dreary stillness
Where before the scene was gay;
No more pranks and no more mischief,
For the children are away.

When we see their tented playhouse
Now deserted 'neath the trees,
And no sound of childish laughter
Floats like music on the breeze,
Then we think of lives left lonely
Grieving hearts that ache to day
In the homes bereft forever
When their darlings went away.

Though oft times we are dis racted
By continual romp and rout,
Though they try our nerves and patience,
How we miss them when they re out!
We are happy too and thankful
When we hear no sound of play,
That they only went to visit
And they have not gone to stay.

—Margaret Scott Hall.

A WOMAN'S WAY.

He flung the door open on a black night full of pattering rain. "Now go!" he said, his brown face blanched with rage, "and don't come back!"

She turned to a corner where a cradle stood, and snatched from it a bundle of flannel. Her whole figure bristled with tragedy.

"I won't come back—never!" she flung in his face as she passed him. The door closed behind her with an angry bang.

Hugging the flannel bundle, Lisa plunged through the lilac bushes and groped for the gate in the garden fence. Something scampered after her—leaped upon her with a questioning bark—Stephen's dog. She rapped him smartly across his honest ears.

"Go back, Watch!" she commanded, "you are not to follow me any more."

Watch slunk away, and Lisa, through a turmoil of wind and rain, scurried along a little path under some soughing orchard boughs, and came to her mother's door. As she beat upon it she called, brokenly:

"Let me in, mother. Steve has turned me out, and I've come home with the baby—let me in!"

A cross, rheumatic old woman, with a nightcap on her head and a lamp in her hand opened the door.

"Hey? Is it you, Lisa? Land sakes? You're dripping wet. What'd you say about Steve?"

Lisa stepped into a kitchen, where the fire had been covered for the night, and the only light was that in the old woman's hand. She breathed heavily, and her handsome face, under soft waves of disordered dark hair, wore a sullen look.

"Steve and I have quarreled, mother. He said hard things to me—I said hard things to him. I'm not going back to him any more. There's the whole story for you."

The old woman assumed the air of a ruffled hen.

"What did you two quarrel about?" she demanded, "Most like Steve is half seas over."

"Steve isn't a drinking man. We got to talking about an old flame of mine—Rastus. He accused me of liking the man still. One word led to another, and before I knew it we were in a regular cat-and-dog-fight. So here I am, and I suppose I may go back to my old room and put the baby to bed."

"Well, if I ever heard the beat of this!" cried the elder woman, shrilly. "I hope Steve will give up your clothes and that blue chinaware your pa brought from over seas. For my part, Lisa, I wish you had married Rastus, for he owns a sloop, and has money in Plymouth Bank, and he would never have turned his wife out of doors on a raging night like this. You git that blue china to-morrow, Lisa."

Lisa set her lips stubbornly.

"I don't care about the china, mother. He told me not to come back, and," with a mirthless laugh, "a good wife ought to obey her husband. I'll not set foot in his house again—not if wild horses are sent to draw me!"

"Well, well! There's the lamp. Take your old room, Lisa—it's yours. To think you should be brought to this pass, and you married only a year!"

Lisa went to the room which she had occupied as a girl. Whether she slept or not, her mother did not know. She was early astir the next morning, and she plunged into the kitchen work with a will. Her mother sat by the fire and crooned to the baby.

"It seems good to see you about the house again, Lisa," purred the old woman, "you always was capable. When dinner time comes Steve will wish he hadn't quarreled with you. He's a precious fool—that Steve!"

Lisa's face hardened.

"I'm glad you like to have me around once more, mother," she answered. "While your rheumatism is bad, you mind baby, and leave the work to me—I'll take care of everything."

For a week her rage burned fiercely; then slowly, surely, it began to cool. Beyond a limited period such violent emotions are difficult to sustain. One afternoon, when her mother was sewing beside the sleeping child, Lisa made her first concession to the vague uneasiness that now possessed her. She caught up her sunbonnet, and with heart beating fast, stepped out into the orchard.

The grass was strewn with the pink petals of apple-blossoms and powdered with the dust of seeded dandelions; but Lisa did not look at these. Stealthily she approached the house where she had lived one brief year with Stephen.

At this hour he was sure to be out in his boat. Only the dog, Watch, was on guard at the door stone. At sound of Lisa's step the animal looked up and wagged his tail in recognition. Watch would tell no tales. She stroked his tawney head, and creeping to a window peered through into the kitchen.

The table was piled with unwashed dishes, the floor had not been swept since her departure. The baby's empty cradle still stood in a corner; the stove presented a spectacle of ashes, shavings and blackened cooking vessels. Stephen was not a handy man—he could never "rid up" a place. Lisa's order-loving heart ached to see her former home in such a plight. She longed to enter—wash the dishes and scrub the floor; but that was clearly impossible. Fearful of being surprised at her surreptitious observations she turned and hurried back through the orchard. The next day a neighbor startled her with news:

"It's easier, any time, to manage a mule than a man, Lisa. Stephen has sold his boat and gone away to sea. He's left the key in the door of his house. You'd better go take it out. For the baby's sake you ought to look after his bit of property."

Lisa put down her mixing bowl on the kitchen table and ran to Stephen's deserted dwelling.

Yes, it was empty. The shades had been pulled down over the windows, the front gate was nailed up. Watch, on the door step, greeted her with a lonesome whine. She found the key in the door, as her neighbor had said. Having drawn it forth, and satisfied herself that everything was secure about the place, she twisted her hand in the dog's collar and led him back with her through the orchard.

"You will live with me now, Watch," she said, as she tied him up in her mother's porch and gave him a bountiful dinner. Then she went to her own room and hung the key of Stephen's house on a nail above her bed. It hung there untouched, for fifteen years.

Rastus, strolling through the woods one day, came suddenly upon Lisa, in a pleasant spot among the pines. She was seated on the trunk of a fallen tree, watching her little daughter as the child pulled the pink and white arbutus from under the brittle brown needles. The balm of spring steeped the air. The woods, awaiting resurrection, stood silent and breathless. Only the pines whispered at intervals, and the fluting of a thrush echoed in the distance.

"How d'ye do, Lisa?" stammered Rastus, as his broad figure intervened, like a column, betwixt her and the sunshine. The two had not met before since Stephen's departure. Lisa nodded coldly.

"Any news of Stephen?" Rastus managed to articulate.

"No!" she answered, in a tone that made him jump.

"Youl'll never hear from him again," the big hulking fellow blundered on, "Steve is dead, fast enough—all the town folks say so. They've about dropped his name from their talk now. Whether you believe it or not, you're a widow, Lisa."

She made no answer. Her eyes were following the movements of her child. Rastus stood dumb and shaky beside her. He could not go, and he dared not remain. Presently she turned her handsome head.

"What! are you still here?" she said, in a withering tone.

"I thought I'd like to talk with you a bit, Lisa," he replied humbly.

"I've no time for talk to-day. I'm busy with the baby. Don't let me keep you waiting any longer."

Rastus shuffled off through the dead leaves and never looked back.

He went fishing on the Banks, and then shipped aboard a coaster; and five more years passed before he spoke to Lisa a second time. Then, early one frosty morning, he chanced to pass by Stephen's deserted house. Rastus always slackened his pace at that partitular turn in the road, for though he was not a bad-hearted man, he liked to look over into Stephen's tangled garden, and think what a fool his rival had been. Now, as his eyes wandered beyond the nailed-
