up gate, he saw Lisa, with a spade in her hand, digging what seemed to be a grave under the lilac bushes. She was down in the sinister hole, throwing out the brown earth with rapid movement. Near by stood a rude wooden box. With his heart in his throat, Rastus leaped the gate.

"Good God!" he cried, in terror, "what has happened, Lisa?"

She looked up from her work. Her hands were stained with earth and her eyes were red.

"It's Watch," she answered, "Steve's dog. He died of old age. I brought him over here to bury him in Steve's garden."

"Give me the spade, Lisa—that work is too hard for a woman.

She repelled him with a gesture.

"No one shall bury Watch but me," she said, and went on throwing up the fresh dirt, regardless that a good part of it fell upon Rastus. He soon found the role of spectator intolerable, and was glad to sneak away, and leave her to her melancholy task.

His third interview with the woman of his love occurred a few years later. Her mother had died, and she was living alone with her young daughter. The latter had shot up into a tall, fair girl, with flaxen plaits hanging on her slim shoulders, and eyes as brown and soft as a deer's. In the village academy she stood at the head of her class.

It was winter, and snow whitened the world. Rastus met Lisa toiling through the deep drifts, with arms full of parcels from the village store. The indignation in his heart gave him sudden courage.

"Let me carry your burdens for you, Lisa," he entreated, and tried to take the bundles from her.

"No one can do that," she answered, drawing quietly away from him.

He noticed the streaks of grey in her abundant hair and the faint hollows in her cheeks.

"See here, Lisa!" he said, you've found life pretty bitter, I take it, and so have I. Steve died long ago, otherwise somebody would have heard of him before this time. Once he came between you and me, but you are free now, and I want to help you—I want to marry you."

She stopped short in the snow.

"'Twas about you that Steve and I quarreled," she answered, with a stern judicial air. "Your a good man, Rastus, and worthy some good woman's love. But you must go your own way, and leave me go mine. After this talk I never want to see your face again."

"Lisa!" he cried, angrily, "didn't you ever care for me?"

"No, never!" she answered solemnly.

Rastus had received his coup de grace. With something between an oath and a groan, he turned on his heel and dashed away through the snow. The next day it was noised about the neighborhood that Rastus had left his native village and would never return to it.

The flight of the "dark brown years" continued. On a certain night, Lisa, seated by the fire, said to her young daughter:

"To-morrow is your fifteenth birthday—what can I do to make you happy to-morrow, dear?"

The girl, thoughtful and grave beyond her years, put down her lesson over which she was poring, and slipping out of her chair, laid her fair head on her mother's lap.

"Let us go over to father's house," she coaxed. "I have never seen the inside of it, you know—let us go, mother, and keep my birthday where I was born. I would rather do that than anything else in the world."

The elder Lisa stroked the flaxen braids.

"Very well," she answered, if this is your wish, dear, I have no right to say nay to it. Now that your father is dead, the house belongs to you."

"Do you really think he is dead, mother?" said little Lisa, whistfully.

"Yes, child. He went away to foreign parts, and died long ago. I've paid the yearly tax on the property, and for your sake, kept watch over it always. It is yours, and you shall go there to-morrow, if you like."

With perfect docility she took the key from the nail above her bed and prepared to accompany the child to her humble heritage.

The break of day saw the pair on their way through the orchard. Patches of snow still glimmered in shady hollows, but a brave robin was singing on the topmost bough of an apple tree. In the rusty lock the key grated harshly: the long-closed door swung backward, and the two Lisas stepped into Stephen's house.

It was cold and musty, like a tomb. The dust of fifteen years covered everything. The elder woman advanced to the mantel, and saw pinned against the long silent clock a slip of paper. Evidently it had been placed there to attract attention. She shook the dust from it and read these words:

"I can't stand this sort of life any longer, Lisa. I know I'm a beast, but I love you true. It's not likely you'll ever forgive me, and I don't deserve it. I've sold the boat to buy an outfit, but I leave the house and orchard to you."

Signed, STEPHEN.

It was like a voice from the grave. He had thought she would enter the house after his departure and find his message. In pale silence Lisa slipped the paper into her pocket, threw off her bonnet and shawl and kindled a fire in the rusty stove. Straightway mother and daughter fell to work.

From garret to cellar they swept and scrubbed. They opened the doors to the keen spring air, washed the windows and hung fresh curtains—cleaned and polished everywhere. In a cobwebby closet little Lisa discovered the old blue china which had been her mother's dowry.

"Oh," she cried, as she spread the delicate pieces on the kitchen table, "I never saw anything so beautiful! May I not have my birthday supper from it—here—with you, when the work is all done, mother?"

"If you like, dear," answered the elder Lisa.

At set of sun the house was in order. The newly scoured table, spread with a white cloth and the blue china, stood in the center of the clean floor, ready for supper.

"And now," said little Lisa gleefully, we will go home and put on our best dresses, mother, and bring over my birthday cake, and the bread and tea."

The mother submitted quietly. This day belonged to her child, and she should have her young will in all things. They shut the house door behind them, but something was amiss with the long disused lock. The key would not turn in it. In vain they tugged and twisted.

"Never mind, mother," said the younger Lisa, impatient of the time lost in vain effort, "let us leave the door as it is. Nobody will trouble things here while we are away.

In that old-fashioned community little was to be feared from trespassers. The pair crossed the orchard, washed off the stains of labor, made the fair braids and the dark, silver-threaded coils of hair sleek and shining, and donned their Sunday gowns. Then the birthday cake and other eatables were packed in a basket and mother and daughter returned to Stephen's house.

As they stepped again into the kitchen they were startled to preceive that the place was no longer tenantless. A shabby, grizzled man was seated before the freshly polished stove, warming his hands at its cheerful glow. The entrance of the woman brought him to his feet. He looked at them in a furtive, half-ashamed way.

"Beg pardon," he said, addressing the elder Lisa, "I found the door ajar, and made bold to walk in. Are any of Stephen's folks still living about here?"

She put her basket upon the table.

"I am Stephen's wife," she answered, "and this is his daughter," jerking a hand toward little Lisa. The intruder's eyes lingered on the child.

"She doesn't favor you, ma'am,' 'he said with an effort.

"No she is like her father's people," replied the elder Lisa, coldly.

"That's so. I used to know Steve. He was a bad lot—quarrelsome, hard as a flint, jealous as Satan. A saint could'nt live with him."

"You are making tolerably free with my husband's character. Others were hard and quarrelsome as well as Stephen. Where did you know him?"

"Oh, I've met him often in foreign parts. For fifteen years he's been knocking round the world—Steve has—in Ceylon, with the coolies, in Singapore, in China, getting a bit of money together for his wife and little girl. Once he drove the two out of his house, I've heard, and the mean cuss has gone homeless himself, ever since, to pay for it. And served him right!"

"I received a letter from Stephen today," said Lisa, in a hard, dry voice. "'Twas written fifteen years ago. I found it this morning, when I came into the house—for the first time since he and I parted.

"You don't mean to say that you havent't crossed Steve's threshold since that night?"

"Certainly not. He drove me out, and I've stayed out. But this is my daughter's birthday, and she wanted to spend it under her father's roof—so I came along with her.

"My lord!" he muttered, with a sickly smile, women are set in their ways!"

"Not long ago, in Hong Kong, Steve ran afoul of Rastus; and Rastus told him that only a dum fool would be jealous of a woman like you. He said he'd tried to marry you, thinking Steve dead, but you'd sent him flying. As I was coming home about that time, Steve asked me to take his money to you—it's the bit he's been saving these good many years, and he owes it all to you, he says, for that brute business of fifteen years ago."

He drew from his breast a bulky leather pocket book, and laid it on the table. The two women, comely matron and fair young girl, were watching him closely.

"There 'tis!" he said. Steve's money, in good American notes. And now that I've done his errand, I'll travel along to the village."

"Won't you have a cup of tea first?" said little Lisa.

"I guess not, my dear—it won't do. I'd best move on."

All at once he had assumed an old, hopeless appearance. As he started for the door, the two women saw that his shoulders were bent and that he limped as he walked. The elder Lisa made one swift rush after him.

"Stephen!" she cried, "do you think I don't know you, Stephen."

In that door through which he had once driven her, she stood and barred his way with outstretched arms. And little Lisa fell, sobbing, on his neck.

'Tis asserted that those who flatter us are our enemies. This may be true, but we are bidden to love our ememies; hence all women adore flatterers.

For the Sentinel.

Shamokin's Schools.

SHAMOKIN, PA., MAY 6th, 1901.

Throughout the year your correspondent has written several letters on "coal and coal-mining" for the SENTINEL. As the subject of education is one in which everybody is interested, and as Shamokin's pride is her public school system, a few thoughts will be given on that.

Shamokin, a mining town, contains about 35,000 inhabitants, although there are only a few over 18,000 within the corporate limits, and hence only that number who come under our school system. In the city are a high school and seven grammar schools, employing in all nearly one hundred teachers. The principals of the grammar schools and nearly, if not entirely, all of the teachers in those departments, are graduates of the city high school, which means that they are local talent trained for the purpose. The high school faculty is composed entirely of collegians, each selected with especial reference to his qualifications and experience in his particular line.

The course of study is so arranged that the student receives thorough training from the primary department up. The courses are uniform until the pupil is graduated from the grammar school, after which they are elective. In the high school six courses are run, each complete in itself, and equally honorable, but suited to the present or future needs of the individual.

These courses are: Classical, Latin Scientific, English Scientific, Normal, Art, and Commercial.

The first three courses fit for entrance into any of America's best colleges, while the normal course is the equal of that given by any first class normal school; the art course is equally complete, while the commercial course is superior to that offered by any commercial college in the country.

This course demands all the mathematics through solid geometry and conic sections, three years of German, grammar, rhetoric and liturature, chemistry and physics, besides a complete course of shorthand (two years) and bookkeeping, &c., (three years). All other courses ore equally strong. The buildings are large and well equipped, and are heated by steam and lighted by electricity. There is only one poor building in the lot and this will give place at an early date to a large twenty-four room building, the plans of which have already been drawn.

The high school building and Washington, Lincoln and Garfield buildings are the latest additions, each being so complete in construction and perfect in architecture that they would do credit to a city of much greater pretensions.

Over 20 years ago Prof. Wm. F. Harpel, fresh from the Millersville State Normal, entered the public school service here. The schools were few and unimportant. He was made superintendent. Since that time he has not only kept abreast of the time but has seen to it that the schools under his care should have no superiors and few equals; the result being that today her high school, in scholarship, is reckoned second in the state, though there are many larger towns with better natural advantages. In discipline the schools are as near perfection as schools can be. Few men have such a monument to their creative genius as has Supt. Wm. F. Harpel in the city schools of Shamokin.

Ancient Records.

From the London Chronicle.

The collection of Assyrian and Babylonian records at the British Museum has revealed more of the domestic life of people who lived 5,000 years ago than is known in the case of our own countrymen 1,000 years ago. Such was the opinion expressed by Mr. W. St. Chad Boscawen when he explained these relics to an interested audience recently. The clay bricks and cylinders beneath the glass cases were covered with characters testifying to a completely organized system of justice, marriage, divorce and commerce. The bookkeeping of 5,000 years was shown to be wonderfully accurate. A curious form of record is that preserved in the form of baked clay tablets, which were inclosed in clay envelopes, also inscribed with the terms of the transaction, so that a double record provided against the possibilities of damage. The "open and closed evidence" spoken of by Jeremiah is supposed to refer to this system. The practice of recording on a brick the name of the king, of the building and of the city in which it was being erected has had the advantage in modern days that an odd brick may become the means of disinterring a city hitherto unknown.

Why Not Cure Your Cough or Cold?

WESTMINSTER, April 10th, 1890.

MR. JOS. B. BOYLE:

Dear Sir:—For many years I have suffered intensely, on taking cold, from a very troublesome cough, for which I have used a number of various remedies, and obtained but TEMPORARY RELIEF. During the past Spring I was again troubled with the same cough, and through a friend was induced to try YOUR Pectoral Syrup, which not only gave almost INSTANT RELIEF, but a PERMANENT CURE. It gives me great pleasure to say that I believe it to be the best remedy I ever used for the purpose for which it is recommended. Hoping that any person afflicted as I was may be fortunate enough to give it a trial, I am, Truly yours,

Wall Paper!
Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a pointer pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store, therefore I have no opposition. Is you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.

Finest and Cheapest Lines of

L. GLADHILL,
jun-28-tf Westminster, Md.
