Where Love Is Lord.

I take the glory from the sky;
I take the terror from the sea;
I take the charm of life away
For those who walk with me.

I blot the printing in the book;
Before their eyes one word shall flame,
And in their eyes the lips of man
Shall seem to form one name.

Yet will they follow me, although
Earth shakes beneath, heav'n flames above
Careless of life or death they walk
Who are the slaves of love.

—Margaret Gilman George in New Lippincott

A DIAMOND RING.

BY INA BREVOORT ROBERTS.

From the Ladies' World.

Max felt decidedly pleased with himself as he walked up the steps of a palace belonging to one of New York's millionaires. The millionaire and all his belongings were of special interest to the public just at that time because his daughter was shortly to be married to a titled foreigner and the wedding in the magnitude of its splendor was to eclipse all previous weddings.

A well known photographer had received an order from a magazine for photographs of the important rooms in the home of the bride-elect, and Max, who was the photographer's right-hand man, was now on his way to take the pictures.

Arrived at the house, Max began with the drawing-room. He then proceeded to the library. This room, though large and impressive because of the number of books it contained, looked more homelike and less awe-inspiring than the other rooms.

When he had the light and his camera arranged to his satisfaction Max sent away the servants who were helping him and prepared to take the picture. As he was about to remove the cap he heard the rustle of a gown, and a woman's face appeared between the curtains that hung in a doorway directly in range of the camera.

The face belonged to a tall, slender creature, half girl, half woman. When she saw Max she seemed startled, but at sight of his camera she recovered her composure.

"May I come in?" She asked the question in a hesitating way.

Max smiled at her. "I would rather you waited a few minutes," he returned, uneasily, "unless you want to be in the picture. Just step back out of sight and I will call you in a moment."

The girl's astonished face as she obeyed him made Max realize that he had been a trifle dictatorial to someone who had more right there than he. She evidently lived in the house and he found himself wondering, as he timed his exposure, in what capacity.

He came to the conclusion that she was probably companion or secretary to one of the family. Her dress, as as well as her way of carrying herself and her manner of speaking, told him she was not a servant, and he knew that the millionaire and his family were out of town. They were supposed to have slipped away to give the bride-elect a few days' rest and shelter from publicity before the wedding.

"You may come in now," Max called.

As the girl entered the room he noticed that she was very pretty. She walked over to his camera, which she examined with interest.

"Do you like this work?" she asked.

"Why, yes," Max answered carelessly, and he smiled. He was a good-looking young man, with a peculiar charm in his smile which made it difficult to refuse him anything he chose to ask.

The girl seated herself before the fire and began listlessly to turn the pages of a magazine, meanwhile asking questions about his work until Max found himself growing communicative. He told her how busy they were at the studio and that he preferred photographic interiors to taking portraits of actresses and celebrities; interior work was harder, but portraits became monotonous.

"This house is a beauty, isn't it?" he remarked.

The girl looked surprised, then she smiled.

"Yes; it is a nice house," she said.

"You don't say that very enthusiastically," observed Max, turning to look at her, "but I suppose you're too used to it to have it impress you as it does me. There'll be a fine time here when that wedding comes off," he went on. "It's going to cost something, I tell you, but I like to see rich people spend their money. It seems queer, though, making such a fuss over a slip of a girl not out of her teens. Do you know her?" he asked suddenly.

"Yes, I know her."

"Do you like her? I have always heard she had a very lovely disposition, sweet and gentle, you know, and all that."

"Oh, I suppose under all her moods she has a fairly good heart, said the girl, rising and going over to look out from one of the windows.

"Well, she'll need it if she keeps her prince in order," said Max in a matter-of-fact tone. "Of all the—I wonder if that girl knows what a poor sort of man he is?"

Max's companion made no reply to this speech, but chancing to look at her, he saw that her cheeks had flushed and that her lips were tightly pressed together.

"I beg your pardon," he said contritely. "That wasn't nice of me, was it—to try to get you to discuss the affairs of the people you work for?"

The girl's face relaxed, and she smiled as she answered: "Oh, it does not matter. People who have money must expect to be discussed, I suppose."

A silence followed which was broken only by the faint splashing of the fonntain in the hall. Max was intent on his exposures and his companion, who had returned to her chair, appeared to be absorbed in a book.

"I wish Maisie could see this house!" Max cried suddenly.

The girl looked up quickly. "Who is Maisie?" she asked.

Max's face grew red under his fair skin; he had spoken without stopping to think. "Maisie is——" he began in a blundering way; "she is the girl I am engaged to," he ended bravely. The shyness in his manner, in such contrast to his former easy assurance, seemed to amuse and please his companion.

"So you are going to be married, too?" she said smiling at him.

"No, I am not going to be married for a long while yet," Max answered, ruefully. "I only wish I were. But there's no such luck."

"Doesn't she want to be married yet?"

"Yes, but we've got to wait."

"Why?" The girl's voice was full of interest.

"Too poor," Max answered, laconically. "We must wait till I get my salary raised and save up something for a rainy day. Can't live on love, you know."

The girl's face grew wistful. "Sometimes I think I should like to try," she said.

Max laughed. "It wouldn't work. You can't enjoy life when you're worrying about money all the time. But, after all," he continued, going back to his own affairs, "it does not really cost such a lot to keep house, and Maisie is a first-rate manager. If I only had more saved up, we would not be actually obliged to wait for the 'raise.' It makes me mad when I think of all the money I wasted before I knew Maisie. I tell you, it takes a girl like her to take the nonsense out of a fellow. Now, just to show you the kind of a girl she is," he went on, "she is crazy about diamonds. So I made up my mind not to propose to her until I had saved enough to buy her a solitaire ring. When I had fifty dollars (you can get a very fair stone for that nowadays, you know) I asked her to marry me, and after she said 'Yes,' we went together to get the ring. And what do you think that girl did? Picked out a plain moonstone and flatly refused to have any diamond. She said diamonds were a foolish extravagance for people like us, and I must put the money away toward furnishing our flat. Now, what do you think of that?" Max looked at his companion as if challenging her to cite an instance of greater heroism.

"I think Maisie is a girl worth having."

"Well, she has made a man of me," declared Max, "and I'll wager that's more than the girl who lives here can do with her prince. In fact, I don't believe she'll even try. All girls are not like Maisie."

Max's companion had risen and was staring into the fireplace, where the flames of the gas log leaped and curled. "You are right," she said: "all girls are not like Maisie. But perhaps she will try," she added, softly, and then went away without waiting to say good-bye.

Max looked after her retreating figure with a perplexed face. "Well!" he ejaculated, 'she did go off in a hurry. I wonder if I hurt her feelings? She seems to be touchy on the subject of that wedding. It isn't often I talk to any one about Maisie, but that girl was different, somehow, from the general run of people. I suppose that comes from watching the swells. If she comes back I'm going to ask her who she is. I wanted to before, but didn't dare. It's funny what there is about some people that won't let you ask them questions."

But his companion of the morning did not appear again.

At the door, as Max was going out, a pompous servant handed him an envelope and a small package. "I was desired to give you these," he said.

"What?"—began Max.

"You were not to ask any questions sir," interrupted the man gently, as without giving Max time to speak, he swung open the massive door, letting in a flood of light and a dim roar of mingled noises.

Bewildered, Max went out into the sunshine and down the marble steps, opening the envelope as he walked. There was a letter inside, written on heavy, monogrammed paper:

"I want Maisie to have what I send
