Successful Wireless Telegraphy at Sea.

From the Scientific American.

On his arrival here a few days ago, Capt. Hogemann, of the steamship "Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse," told of the success they had in working the Marconi apparatus on their last outward trip to Southampton in connection with the fast Cunard steamer "Lucania." It appears the operators on each ship were familiar with the peculiarities of the apparatus on each, and the ships were able to hold aerial converse for nearly three days, until they were about halfway across the ocean.

On December 14, 1901, the "Lucania" sailed three hours before the "Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse;" when the latter passed Sandy Hook and the "Lucania" was sixty miles ahead Saturday afternoon, they began to exchange wireless messages and signals continued throughout the night. At daybreak the next day, Sunday, the "Kaiser" came in sight of the other ship, and at two o'clock P. M. passed her four miles to the southward. During this time twelve special messages were sent by passengers on the "Lucania" to the "Kaiser" for transmission to the wireless station at the Lizard and thence by land wire to the persons in England to whom they were addressed.

Soon after nightfall on Sunday the lights of the ships were not visible to each other. At noon on Monday their messages showed they were forty miles apart. Early that evening the "Kaiser," when off the Banks, ran into a thick fog; later she came into clear weather and sent the following message:

Twenty-five miles east of Banks. Clear water.

The "Lucania," then sixty miles astern, replied:

Thanks. Am still in thick fog.

Gradually after this the clicking aboard the "Kaiser" grew weaker until the instrument stopped, when the ships were estimated to be eighty-five miles apart.

On the last trip west the "Kaiser" exchanged wireless messages with her sister ship, "Kronprinz Wilhelm," bound east, when in midocean.

Though they did not sight each other, they exchanged messages and ascertained they were about forty miles apart. They kept up communication for about two hours, several messages being sent by passengers.

The messages received by the "Kaiser" on her trip east were duly transmitted ahead of the arrival of the "Lucania," and when within fifty-five miles of her destination she notified the officials when she would arrive.

Such practical illustrations of the utility of the wireless system of telegraphy leave no doubt as to its value in making the navigation of the ocean safer, for it is a sure preventive of collisions at sea in a fog or at night, by reason of the certainty of advance notification between different vessels.

The girl with a rainy day skirt has been right in it.

MY TREASURE HOUSE.

There are treasures in the ocean,
There are treasures in the sea;
There are treasures in the mountains,
There are treasures on the lea;
But the great, the grand hereafter
Holds the treasure house for me.

There the spacious vaults of heaven
Will be opened for us all,
That our treasures may be garnered
In that storehouse, great and small;
For our Father owns the mansions
Where we may lay our treasures all.

There He sits in th' glorious radiance
Of an everlasting day,
And we'll know Him by his vestments,
All of spotless purity;
And a crown He'll wear—a crown of love—
None more grand could ever be.

What are rubies, what are diamonds,
What the gold and silver gleams
Of earth's jewels—rare or common—
'Side the glory of the beams
That will fall upon our pathway
As we cross the death-cold stream?

As they light the gem-decked portals
Of the vaults—our treasures hold—
Where are hidden many a loved one
In that house of purest gold;
Where the Lord, the King of Glory,
Doth the mystic key e'er hold.

What are silks and costly satins,
What the tinsel and the plumes,
With which on earth we deck our persons
As we tread through stately rooms?
All will perish, all will vanish,
Ere the passing of many "moons;"
But the blood-washed, heaven-gained garments,
Will be ours forevermore.

Let us mourn not, then, for loved ones,
Who have gone but to prepare
Room and raiment for our spirits
When we, too, shall greet them there;
For we'll hope and strive to enter
The great treasure house of God;
Where the true and ransomed spirits
With the angels long have trod.

—Mrs. W. P. Miller, in St. Louis Globe-Dem.

THE LOST FINGER.

The ranch of Senor Diaz was on a charming slope, overlooking the broad, smooth waters of one of the tributaries of the Parana, on whose opposite shore the rank grass grew ten or twelve feet high.

The house itself had a tropical character; it was Spanish-American, with a cool, shady veranda, a long, low front, painted walls and latticed windows, a spacious court and a flat roof, provided with a parapet, which gave the whole structure the appearance of a fort. Many acres of cultivated land showed long lines of sugar cane and tall trees ladened with bananas, in surprising contrast to the dark, impenetrable mass of wild bushland which in the distance surrounded the settlement.

Senora Diaz was one of the tropical beauties of whom Murillo dreamed.

"I am going to test your gallantry," she said, coming out on the veranda where I sat, "by asking you to help me to water my flowers, for with my lame hand it is not easy for me to lift the heavy watering pot."

"I am at your service, but allow me—am I wrong?—to remind you that you promised to tell me the story of how your hand was lamed."

"Certainly. As soon as the flowers are watered we will have coffee on the veranda, and you will hear all about it."

Accordingly I was shortly afterward sipping coffee with the little Lolita, my host's only daughter and my pet, beside me, while her mother rolled a cigarette, lighted it and began as follows:

When we came here this was a very wild place, and we had to endure a number of pests. For instance, when Lolita was a baby, my husband and his men went off one moring to work as usual, and the child lay asleep on a mat at the end of the room. Suddenly I saw on the floor a skin of a mouse from which the whole body had been sucked, as from an orange. I knew at once that a snake must be near, for they feed on mice and them in this fashion, but, carefully as I looked about me, I could see no snake, till all at once it occurred to me that it might be under the baby's mat. I snatched the child up and placed her in safety. Then I lifted softly a part of the mat and there it was—the long, slimy, green and gold reptile coiled up and fast asleep. Ah, how I jumped! I ran out into the courtyard to call for help. Luckily our man Jose, was there, and he killed the reptile. But as we cleared more acres the snakes left us to hide themselves in the forest. I began to hope our cares were ended, but they were only just begun. Wild beasts now first appeared on the scene.

One morning while we were at breakfast one of our herdsmen brought the news that our cattle, which graze in the tall grass on the other side of the river, had been attacked by a jaguar that had killed one of the bulls. The man who told us this had escaped with his life, yet he would have scarcely done so if he had not misled the beast or had there not been a fat ox there.

A week passed without a new alarm, and we had come to think less about it, when suddenly three or four Indians rushed in to tell us how a great jaguar had broken into their camp and killed a woman and one of their dogs.

When my husband heard the story, he judged that it was the same animal that had attacked our bull, for the Indians described it as a creature of singular color, far lighter than any they had seen about there, so that they named it "The White Death."

We all thought it high time to do something, and my husband called his people together to go out and hunt the animal.

I remember that morning distinctly. They went away cheerfully enough, each man with his gun and hunting knife, and Moro, our bloodhound, was with them. My husband turned around just as he entered the wood and kissed his hand to me. Then he and his companions vanished in the forest.

When I found myself with Lolita alone in the house and thought of what might happen if they met that terrible wild animal, such anxiety seized me (although I never thought I could be in danger) that I could not be contented till I had locked every door in the house, and then I seated myself in the great sitting room, took Lolita on my lap and tried to tell her a story.

Suddenly I heard a scratching along the roof, and then a dull thud, as if something heavy had fallen.

Anxious and nervous as I was, I started up with a cry, although I had no presentiment what it was.

The next moment I heard just over me a sound which I could not mistake—a long, passionate roar—a cry that I had often heard from the woods at night and never without feeling as if my heart stood still. The thought rushed through my mind, "Oh, heaven, the jaguar!"

I shall never forget that moment! For a second I was quite rigid and helpless, as if life had departed, and then a thought flashed upon me. The jaguar was not to be kept off if he penetrated here from the roof, for most of the inner doorways had only draperies. In my dining room was a great wooden meal chest, nearly empty and large enough to hold six or seven persons at once If Lolita and I could get there, thought I, we are saved.

I seized the child, ran with her into the dining room and crept into the chest. Unfortunately it had a spring lock, so that I was forced to hold the lid open with my left hand to guard against its locking and immediately stifling us. But it had more than an inch of outer rim, which completely hid my fingers.

It was not a moment too soon. We were scarcely hidden when I heard the great claws scratching along the floor, and the hungry sniffling of the jaguar showed me that he was in search of food.

He came straight to the chest and paused a moment, as if he feared a trap. Then he put his head close to the small opening, so that I could feel his hot breath. He sniffed awhile and then tried to raise the lid with his paw.

How I trembled! But, thank heaven, the great paw would not go in the narrow crevice, and I held the cover fast by clinging to the inner part of the lock with all the strength of desperation. All he could do was to stretch out his tongue and lick my fingers until they bled as if they had been scratched by a saw. And then, as he tasted blood and heard Lolita cry—for my poor darling was just as frightened as I was—his eagerness increased, and he began to utter piercing yells, which sent icy chills over me.

I wonder why the fright did not kill me, but the touch of Lolita's little arm around my neck seemed to keep up my courage.

Still the worst was yet to come.

When the jaguar found that he could not reach me from below, he sprang upon the chest. His huge weight crushed my fingers between the two parts of the lock. Then I thought all was over and shrieked so that my cries rang through the whole house.

But my cries were presently answered by a sound which made my heart throb with joy—answered by the barking of our bloodhound. The jaguar heard it, too, for he sprang down and stood for a moment listening, then ran to the door as if to flee.

Again came the sound of the dog's bark—this time nearer—and at the same time the voices of men calling to each other. Contrary to expectation, they were already coming back.

Meanwhile the jaguar seemed to be bewildered and ran wildly to and fro. Suddenly a loud cry came from one of the windows, followed by two shots and a fearful howl; then my husband's voice anxiously called:

"Cachita, where are you?"

I had just strength enough left to get out of the chest, drag myself to the door and let my husband in. Then I swooned away.

They told me afterward that our bloodhound found the jaguar's trail, leading straight back to the house, and they all hurried home at full speed, fearing harm would come to me.

My husband and Jose came in front of the rest and the jaguar shot through the window, but my husband told me that when he saw the animal in the house he felt as if stifled.

I could not move a joint of that hand for many weeks afterward. The Indians gave me medicine to heal it, and they say that after awhile I shall be able to use it again. I did not need this injury to make me remember that day. If I were to live a thousand years, I could not forget the few terrible moments that I spent in the chest—moments that seemed to comprise an eternity of terror.

Sage Advice of a Father.

"My son," said a fond but wise parent, "you are leaving me to go out into the world. I have nothing to give but advice. Never tell a lie.

"Always read your contract. A man might consider he is getting a sinecure if he were offered a position picking blossoms off a century plant, but, you see, he wouldn't have a remunerative occupation if he were paid on piecework.

"Be not overcritical. Even the most ordinary sort of a genius can tell when the other fellow is making a fool of himself.

"Remember that the young man, like the angler's worm, is rather better for being visibly alive.

"Be careful in the choice of your surroundings. Environment will do a great deal for a man. For example, flour and water in a china jug is cream sauce; in a pail on the sidewalk it is billsticker's paste.

"Don't forget that there's time for everything and that everything should be done in its proper time. Never hunt for bargains in umbrellas on a rainy day.

"You may make enemies. If you know who they are don't mention them. Silence is golden; it saves the money that might otherwise be spent in defending a libel suit. If you don't know who they are—well, abuse lavished on a concealed enemy is like charity indiscriminately bestowed. It's a good thing wasted."
