The Old Rail Fence.

In the merry days of boyhood when we never knew a care Greater than the mumps or measles or a mother's cut of hair,
When a sore toe was a treasure and a stone bruise on the heal Filled the other boys with envy which they tried not to conceal, There were many treasured objects on the farm we held most dear, Orchard, fields, the creek we swam in, and the old spring cold and clear; Over there the woods of hickory and of oak so deep and dense, Looming up behind the outlines of the old rail fence.

On its rails the quail would whistle in the early summer morn, Calling to their hiding fellows in the field of waving corn,
And the meadow larks and robins on the stakes would sit and sing Till the forest shades behind them with their melody would ring.
There the catbird and the jaybird sat and called each other names,
And the squirrels and the chipmunks played the chase-and-catch-me games,
And the garter snake was often unpleasant evidence In the grasses in the corners of the old
rail
fence.

As we grew to early manhood when we thought the country girls In the diadem of beauty were the very fairest pearls, [redacted]
sitting hand in hand,
Up so near the gates of heaven we could almost hear the band,
When she heard a declaration whispered in her list'ning ear—
One she often since has told me she was mighty glad to hear.
On my head there's now a desert fringed with foliage of gray,
And there's many a thread of silver in her old head to-day, Yet the flame of love is burning in our bosoms as intense As it burned in the corner of that
rail
fence.

JUST ONCE.

Abner Stone was dead and buried. The very breezes seemed to blow about the old house with more freedom than they had done for years, even daring to flutter the staid white curtains in the solemn front room, though a raised sash was in itself an innovation. "Windows were made to let light, not wind," so had declared the law and the prophets, to which Almira Stone had asserted, She usually opened the door for a weekly airing, but to-day there were sashes raised, to-day when Almira Stone was to go forth over the worn threshold for the last time. "There would be nothing to call her back to the house of Abner Stone's children," she thought with almost a feeling of joy which she quickly suppressed. It was not seemly, here where the dead had so lately lain. Joy indeed might come with the morning when she should have put the old life far behind her, but not to-day. Her belongings were all packed. They were not many, only her meager wardrobe of bare essentials and a few quilts and blankets. Almira Ross had not brought great plenishings when she came to Abner Stone's house as his second wife, and the years had made sad havoc with that little. One modest box and a small iron-bound trunk bore the address of "Miss Mabel Ross, East Bradford." She had directed them to Mabel Ross rather than to Mrs. Almira Stone. Some way she felt that they were more sure of reaching a tangible destination. Mrs. Almira Stone and East Bradford were as yet incongruous elements without two things in common—Mabel and Gilbert. They were her's and East Bradford had welcomed them into its ranks of workers. Henceforth they were to share one home as they had done years ago when Mabel was a child of ten and Gilbert a baby of four; when she had done washings and ironings for the people of Temple. In those days Mabel had trudged about and gathered up bundles of soiled linen, and carried them back renovated and cleansed. Now she sat all day in the private office of Morris and Crane and translated queer hieroglyphics on keys of an instrument that clicked distractingly.

She had been there to see Mabel once when Mr. Stone had gone to East Bradford on business, and she had never forgotton the monotonous click clack of the typewriters in the room where she had timidly sought her daughter. It was tiresome work, but she could never quite understand why they should pay Mabel the astonishing sum of sixty dollars per month for such slight service. Sixty dollars seemed an enormous sum, more than she had ever held in her hand at one time, in the whole course of her life.

Gilbert was doing well, too, for a boy of fourteen. He earned fifty cents a day as errand boy in the same establishment. They were both smart children, very like their father. He could always turn his hand at anything, only he was apt to grow discouraged. He would have left them well off if it had not been for that. But Mabel never seemed to grow discouraged; if she did, no one knew of it, and her letters were always bright
