THE HAPPY WAY.

The happy way—the happy way—
I wonder where it lies?
Somewhere beneath a brighter day,
And under stormless skies?
I'd like to walk that happy way—
Sweet songs to sing—sweet words to say!

The happy way—the happy way;
How sad our earthly lot—
For I have walked it many a day,
And yet I knew it not!
I knew not—till its sun had set
And left me darkness, and Regret!

—Atlanta Constitution.

THE LIEUTENANT'S WOOING.

If there was one thing Lieutenant Stoddard disliked, it was chasing Apaches. He would not have held so great an aversion to that occupation if there had been occasionally a chance of a skirmish with the redskins, or even a running fight, for Stoddard was no coward, despite the fact that he was the handsomest man at Ft. L——, and spent as much time and pains with his toilet as an Eastern man of fashion; but it was tiresome to know that you were only to drive the sneaking villains across the Mexican border without even taking a stray shot at them; and then riding across that blazing, sandy country was trying to a man who was proud of his clear complexion, and had a horror of an alkalibleached mustache.

Consequently, as the lieutenant and his men rode homeward one day after having made a caricature raid on a band of Indians (they—the Indians—had stampeded a bunch of steers belonging at the Fort and barbecued a few of the fattest ones), he was in a bad humor with life in general, for the sun had caused his handsome straight nose to peal in an unsightly manner, and it would be weeks before he could gaze into his mirror with anything like complacency. And he was filled with consternation and softly cursed his luck when he learned that during his absence the major's niece from Boston had arrived to spend the season at the garrison. He skipped up to his room and spent an hour brushing his uniform, and trying to remove the sunburn from his neck, before he ventured among the officers and their families, only to be told that the major had taken his niece, three of the women belonging at the fort and Captain DuBach out in an old express wagon for a view of the surrounding country. So, after giving an account of his trip, he ate his dinner in gloomy silence, and afterwards sat upon the veranda in front of the officers' quarters smoking and sulking, until, weary with his long ride, he fell asleep.

He was aroused late in the afternoon by Mrs. Mason's word's: "That is Lieutenant Stoddard. Isn't he handsome?"

Then followed a silence during which Stoddard felt that some one was inspecting him, and he had hard work to keep his eyes closed.

"He isn't bad looking," said an indifferent voice, after a time. Stoddard could endure it no longer. He opened his eyes and found himself face to face with Mabel Wainwright, the major's niece. She was gazing at him with languid interest, just as when her uncle had called her attention to them, she had looked at the towering mountains behind the fort, and the beautiful valley which lay like a great, grassy, cliff-surrounded, boulder-islanded-lake before it.

"We were looking at you and talking about you," said Mrs. Mason, with that easy familiarity to which people shut in from the world become accustomed. She was the surgeon's wife and made no secret of her admiration for the lieutenant's good looks.

Stoddard stammered out something in reply and arose and bowed his best bow to Miss Wainwright; but beyond a slight nod in return, Mabel took no further notice of him and passed into the building. Nor during the week that followed did she give him more than a civil greeting when they chanced to meet.

Now when a man has lived five years at an isolated fort, and during that time has posed as the handsome man of the garrison, and has been petted and flattered by nearly every woman he meets, it is quite natural that he should feel angry at such treatment. The lieutenant had planned to make a great impression on Mabel Wainwright. He had not doubted that she would be surprised to find a man like himself at an Arizona military post; instead she seemed to accept him as one of the necessary adjuncts of the place, as she did the common soldiers, the barracks, or the furniture.

As he sat one evening oiling and trimming his moustache and applying a patent lotion to his sunscorched features—the Apaches had been especially nasty, and he had been forced to make another raid—it suddenly occurred to him that Miss Wainwright had been at Fort L—— for a fortnight, and had not yet bestowed upon him an admiring glance. A profane exclamation escaped him as he thought of the pains he had taken to display his different uniforms, from dress parade, which made him appear every inch a soldier, to an old fatigue suit that displayed his magnificent shoulders and handsome throat; and he resolved, then and there, to ignore the "eastern butterfly" from that time on, and to devote himself to the other women of the officers' quarters who appreciated a man of his caliber.

When a man attempts to ignore an attractive woman who has already wounded his vanity, he is treading on dangerous ground, especially if he be heart free. But it was not until the warm weather had subsided sufficiently to permit of the revival of the weekly "hops," that Stoddard first began to waver from his resolution. When he saw Mabel Wainwright float down the mess room with Captain DuBach, he gave a little start of surprise. He thought some of the women at the fort pretty, but she was beautiful. Mrs. Mason could waltz with delightful abandonment, but this girl seemed
