the world have you got there?"

"I have a pig here," answered the young lady. "I am afraid the pig is overcome by the heat. How do you do, Walter?"

"There's a sight more chance that you are overcome by the heat yourself," retorted Shepherd, wrathfully, and, in spite of her protesting gasp, he seized the umbrella and shaded her pretty head with it. This maneuver gave him a chance to shake hands with her, and left the pig exposed in the glow.

"Say, he's a dead one," remarked Cuppy.

The small animal lay apparently moribund on the planking and emitted a feeble wail when Shepperd poked a toe gingerly against his somewhat emaciated flank.

"Oh, dear, what shall we do?" said the girl. "Do you think it is going to die? Auntie is so severe when I fail in my duties."

"Good heavens, Lydia, do you mean to say that a pig more or less——"

"But you don't understand, Walter—I must show myself trustworthy in every detail. Aunt Elizabeth says so. She knows a girl who couldn't stay at the Rivington Street Mission—that's where I want to go—because they couldn't rely on her to clean milk cans. Do you believe that if we sprinkled water on the poor thing—"

"Let's throw him in the brook," muttered Shepherd between his teeth. "He'd appreciate it, and so would I."

"No, no, no," cried Miss Farrow. "Your handkerchief."

Shepherd gave her one wild look and vaulted over the low railing at the side of the bridge. He soused his handkerchief in the stream, clambered up the bank and squeezed out the water over the pig, who was reduced by this demonstration to the last extremity of terror. He rolled about, involving himself in the cord around his neck; he squeeled; dissolution seemed imminent.

"I don't know much about pigs," said Shepherd, desperate because of the genuine trouble in Lydia's big gray eyes. "Do you, Cuppy?"

"Aw, I seed one in Jones' wood, an say, I think this fellow's fakin'. Stan' up Bill," ordered Cuppy, grabbing the leading line "Lemme take him erlong fer yer, Miss Farrer."

"I couldn't let you, Cuppy, really I couldn't," protested Lydia. "Aunt gave me this to do, and every failure counts against against me. Besides, you aught to be at botany. Give me the cord." She leaned rather wearily against the rail and contemplated the hot stretch of road. "But I am tired and thirsty," she added.

"What's that place up the slope?" inquired Shepherd, pointing to the right. The place was where a rude bench stood under some overhanging trees on the neighboring hillside. The clear water of a spring spouted generously out of a rock close by it, splashing into a pool, and the dark green of the foliage surrounding it made the spot stand out on the knoll like a bower.

"That's the—that's a—why, a spring," faltered Lydia.

"The farmers call it the 'Lovers' Well,'" explained Cuppy.

Miss Farrow blushed slightly. She could not help it; Shepherd was looking straight at her.

"Lydia," he said with stern determination, "you and I are going to walk up there and you shall rest yourself. It is absolutely ridiculous for you to think of promenading through the sun with this beast. Cuppy shall guard the pig. You'll take care of that pig, won't you, Cuppy?"

"Yep," agreed that eager youth. "Come on, Bill."

Shepherd picked up the green umbrella and closed it with a snap.

"But—Aunt Elizabeth," the girl demurred. "She will be angry. She will say I'm not fit for Rivington street."

"I advise you not to introduce those subjects at this moment," said Walter, pulling her hand within the crook of his elbow, in an old-fashioned but an extremely comfortable way. "Here is the path. Good-by, Cuppy."

Cuppy, however, was already invisible in a rapidly moving cloud of dust, from which the indignant squeak of the pig drifted back indistinctly to the Lover's Well.

Lydia laid her hat on the bench, and a bashful breeze played with her hair. Shepherd brought her some icy spring water in a pocket drinking cup. They elaborately discussed the mechanism of the cup, and then, after a pause they talked of other things. Perhaps it is unnecessary to specify the topics; Aunt Elizabeth and Rivington street did not figure importantly among them.

"Let us go back across country," suggested Walter, when it was time.

"Very well," said Miss Farrow. "I think we can find a way along the brook. It will be better than the road."

The way along the brook excelled the road in every particular. It led them through thick woods where in the half light they seemed to be alone in the world. But on a ridge which skirted a cleared hollow Shepherd was reminded to the contrary.

"Look," he whispered, grasping Lydia's arm. This was no effort, because she was close beside him.

"It's the botany class," she answered, and they both peered down through the interlocking leaves.

Miss Gibbs, beneath an incongruous sunbonnet, towered in the center of a circle of awed and perspiring urchins. A swamp lily, evidently the subject of her discourse, nodded dejectedly in her uplifted hand. The botany class did not appear to be interested.

"Let's run," said Shepherd.

"Wait," said Miss Farrow. "Don't you hear something coming? Oh, what is it? Oh, what in the world is it?"

On the other side of the clearing where the class was in session the bushes were swaying and crackling as if a miniature cyclone were careering through them. Aunt Elizabeth's scholars dispersed and dashed expectantly toward the disturber of scholastic quiet; Miss Gibbs herself remained rigid. Not, however, for long.

"Sho, sho, sho!" cried Aunt Elizabeth, waving the lily at the maddened pig which came for her at a gait as near to a gallop as pigs achieve. "Sho, sho!"

"Hi!" screamed Cuppy.

"Hey!" howled the botany students, and performed a war dance.

The pig flew between Aunt Elizabeth's feet and there fell prone, panting in extremis, and the lady sat involuntarily at its side. She was speechless when Shepherd assisted her to rise. In the meantime Cuppy and his cohorts had manacled the pig ruthlessly.

"Lydia Farrow," gasped Miss Gibbs, "What does this mean? Are you insane? Are you trying to insult me?"

"Please, ma'am——" began Cuppy.

"Silence! Lydia did you order this outrage?"

"Stand by the boy, anyhow," murmured Shepherd in Miss Farrow's ear.

"Aunt, it was all an accident, and I'm to blame," exclaimed Lydia. "It wasn't Cuppy's fault, really it wasn't."

"I've endured your incompetence long enough," answered Aunt Elizabeth, leading somewhat stiffly, the return march to the farm house. "I do not see how I can recommend you to dear Miss Stein."

"Who is dear Miss Stein?" asked Shepherd.

"She's the head worker at Rivington street," said the aunt.

"Oh," said Shepherd. "Then it's all very easy," and he smiled at Miss Farrow cheerfully.

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, Miss Gibbs, that Lydia and I——"

"Never mind now," put in the girl reddening. "Aunt Elizabeth, Walter is anxious to give you lots of money for the Fresh Air farm."

"That is good of him."

"Yes, Miss Gibbs I think I am bound to."

"Well, I don't see why, although we shall be glad enough to have it," said Aunt Elizabeth, and she turned to regard her charges, straggling along behind and bearing the pig aloft, like a sacrificial victim.

"Shall I tell you why I think I am bound to?" said Shepherd. "You see Lydia and I——"

"I do wish you would wait," Lydia interrupted. "Look at Cuppy. I wonder where he got that name?"

"It is a contraction for Cupid," said Shepherd solemnly.

"Cupid!" sniffed Miss Gibbs. "Cupid!"

Stocking Lore.

The work caused the busy house mother by the contents of the darning basket would be infinitely less if she paid attention to the following stocking lore:

Stockings too small are soon worn into holes.

Stockings too large make the feet tender.

Cheap black stockings are a delusion and a snare.

Thin stockings should be darned with fine worsted.

Try tacking a piece of net—old veiling or plain net will do—across a large hole; then take the threads in and out through this.

A good plan is to strengthen the knees and heels of children's stockings by darning them for some distance on the wrong side when they are bought.

It saves stockings to wear them systematically, each pair in turn.

As to washing stockings:

Don't use soda; have the water moderately warm for both washing and rinsing.

Wash lisle thread stockings in tepid water; use a little soap on the feet only. Rinse in hard water. Dry quickly in the breeze and press with a warm iron.

Silk stockings should be washed in tepid water with mild soap. Rinse them in several waters. Shake them well, and roll them in a cloth to dry, after pulling them into shape.

Stockings should always be turned inside out and well shaken before being washed. They should also be washed by themselves and in different water from any other clothing.

Housewife Suggestions.

A mustard plaster mixed with the white of an egg will not leave a blister.

Cut flowers may be preserved some time if camphor is put in the water.

Stock intended for clear soup must be skimmed as it boils and as long as scum continues to rise.

A little sugar added to the sauce, soup or vegetable in which too much salt has been used, will remedy the evil.

To cut warm cake or bread, use a sharp knife dipped in hot water to make it warm. Thus you will be able to cut it neatly and without waste.

Jars and pickle bottles that smell of onions may be made quite sweet if filled with garden mould and left standing out of doors two or three days. When thoroughly washed they will be found quite sweet, and may be used for jam or any other purpose.

Rub the inner casings of windows that shove up and down hard, with a little hard soap. Treat drawers of a chest in the same way.

If your curtains are near the gas sew small lead weights into the seam, which will keep them from blowing into the flame, thus avoiding danger from fire.

Fingers stained by pealing fruits may be cleaned with strong tea rubbed in well with a nail brush, then rinsed in warm water.

WOODMAN, SPARE THAT TREE!

—:o:—

Woodman, spare that tree!
Touch not a single bough!
In youth it shelter'd me,
And I'll protect it now.
'Twas my forefather's hand
That placed it near his cot,
There, woodman, let it stand,
Thy ax shall harm it not!

That old familiar tree,
Whose glory and renown
Are spread o'er land and sea—
And would'st thou hew it down?
Woodman, forbear thy stroke!
Cut not its earth-bound ties;
Oh, spare that aged oak,
Now towering to the skies!

When but an idle boy
I sought its grateful shade;
In all their gushing joy
Here, too, my sisters play'd.
My mother kiss'd me here;
My father press'd my hand—
Forgive this foolish tear,
But let that old oak stand!

My heart-strings round thee cling,
Close as thy bark, old friend!
Here shall the wild bird sing
And still thy branches bend.
Old tree! the storm still brave!
And, woodman, leave the spot;
While I've a hand to save
Thy ax shall harm it not!

Where Instinct Saves.

From St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The superiorty of instinct over reason in certain crises has been strikingly displayed in the case of the calamities in the islands of Martinique and St. Vincent. It is related by survivors from the scene of the devastated islands that the birds, beasts and reptiles fled from the neighborhood of the craters several days before the cataclysm came. This phenomenon, while noticed at the time, did not attract any attention. It had no message at all for the people in the vicinity of the danger points before the outburst. Some of the survivors recall the warning now with a melancholy interest.

Science, too, showed itself to be blind in contrast with this prescience of the birds and beasts. A commission of savants, appointed by the authorities of that locality, made an examination of Mount Pelee shortly before the explosion, and, although there were signs which everybody can now see portended the coming eruption, they declared that there was no danger. The governor of the island immediately issued a proclamation to this effect, and the signs which the kindling volcanic fires on the mountain wrote across the face of the sky at night went for naught. The scientists and the governor showed the courage and confidence of their ignorance and remained on the ground and perished when the outburst came. With them, and lulled into a false sense of security by their words and acts, were the bulk of the people of the island, who were also destroyed in the tempest of fire.

Other cataclysms of this sort tell a similar story. Science has hitherto been of little service in the way of foretelling earthquakes or volcanoes. And, of course, science is powerless as a means of prevention. The people of Pompeii, like those of Martinique and St. Vincent, were going about their usual vocations, unsuspicious of peril until destruction came, although the portents were plain to the birds and beasts. Macaulay tells the story in an effective way of how, when "Vesuvius groaned with wrath suppress," the eagles, foxes, goats and other members of the brute creation fled to places of safety, while the higher order of beings remained, as at the islands in the Caribbean, until the crash and blaze of doom swept them away.

Man only mocks thee. Man alone
Defies the sulphurous flame, the warning groan,
While instinct, humbler guardian, wakes and saves,
Proud reason sleeps, nor knows the doom it braves.

Our Country.

The recent acquisition of territory by the United States in the Pacific and in the West Indies constitute but a small part of our country's total area but each of our new possessions is valuable and will be of great value in the future. Unlike two of the great nations of the world which outrank us in territorial size the great bulk of our territory is at home, while in the case of Great Britain and France the larger portion of their territory is in the colonies in foreign lands. The territory of the United States, of Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, Samoa, Guam and the Philippines aggregates 3,690,322 square miles. The Danish West Indies are not included. The territory of the continental United States embraces 2,970,230 square miles; Alaska, 590,884, and the Philippines, 117,542. The total population under the domain of the American flag, June 1, 1900, was estimated at 84,233,069, although the exact number of Filipinos is not known.

Among the nations of the world the United States stands fifth in territorial size. Great Britain stands first, with 11,288,277 square miles; Russia ranks next, with 8,644,100; China third, with 4,234,910, and France fourth, with 3,944,072.

The territory of France is only 204,072 square miles, but its colonies embrace 2,923,679 square miles, 1,232,544 of which are in Africa. This is nearly as large as the British territory in Africa, which is only 2,585,220 square miles. France is a republic, yet it is one of the greatest of colony holders.

By far the greater part of British territorial holhings was acquired by purchase or settlement. Hardly a fourth was obtained by conquest. The British flag waves over more territory on the American continent than the American flag flies over.

If a good and pure thought enters your mind, be sure not to cast it out, but to give it prompt and gracious entertainment; for it is worth as much in the way of re-enforcing your character as if it were an angel's visit. Would you turn an angel out, and bar the door against him? All true living begins with true thoughts. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Every noble act is first framed as a mental conception before it can find actual expression in the conduct. The interior life is a prelude to the exterior, though it must not be forgotten that the law of reaction operates here with great force. What we conceive, desire, propose, that we more and more become.

Bunco Bill—"Say, dese country geezers is all on ter de old games, and dey don't bite no more. We'se got ter frame up ter bunco de city folks."

Slippery Steve—"How yer going ter do that?"

Bunco Bill—"Oh, dat's easy, we'll open up an antique furniture store."

DOES FARMING PAY.

A Lover of Husbandry, in the Country Gentleman.

Recent discussons of the question whether farming pays, in the leading agricultural journals of the world, leave the question still open. Perhaps it is best that it should be, so that we, as farmers, may strive more diligently to answer it affirmatively.

We should at least look on the bright side and try to encourage each other. Discouragement is contagious. When Peter said "I go a-fishing," the other deciples said. "We also go with thee." In other lines of business, looking on the bright side has a commercial value. May this not be true also in farming?

A banker, discoursing with one who was taking a gloomy view of husbandry, said to him that he did not blame young people for going from the farm, as they seldom heard anything but grumbling and complaining about farming, that it did not pay. This banker understood well the individual accounts of depositors, and positively affirmed that their deposits showed that there was no real cause for such discouragement.

Much of the capital of the banks of our country is carried there from farms. Many who are interested in banking institutions have made a good share of their wealth on farms in earlier years. If farmers should now withdraw their deposits from these institutions, it would seriously impair the business prosperity of our country. Some will succeed in almost any calling.

Pliny relates that Cressinus gathered so much more wealth from a small piece of ground than his neighbors could from much larger pieces, that they accused him of witchcraft. To defend himself, he brought into court his servants, with their instruments of labor, and said: "My witchcrafts, O Romans, are these. These servants and these tools are all the witchcraft I know of. I say not to my servants, 'Go do this or that,' but 'Come, let us do it,' and so the work goes on." Industry and diligence make any man excellent and chief in any condition, calling or profession.

If the English system of renting for a term of years were generally adopted by the people of the United States it would add millions annually to our income, and many landlords and tenants who now by reason of frequent changes find only loss, would have a handsome return. A rolling stone gathers no moss. As well might a hen experiment in hatching chickens by sitting on eggs now and then a day, or by running from one nest to another to see what would result from it. The true husbandman is one of long patience, waiting for the early and latter rain. He finds more pleasure in setting out small fruit, or in planting an orchard, than in raising mushrooms.

The question under consideration is one of such grart breadth that it is not easy to answer. The most successful business men in a large town near me were brought up on farms, away from the enervating influences of town life. The most prominent and influential men of our great cities are seldom removed more than three or four generations from country life.

It requires the exercise of the most heroic will to resist the powerful influences of degeneracy in the plague spots of the world; and it is largely by the infusion of country blood that our cities are kept from more rapid deterioration. A great reservation of wealth may be stored away in our children, and from these treasuries they may draw their richest supplies in after life. In the long run it pays better to have ability to require wealth than to confer great riches on children who may not retain them.

The general purpose of amassing large fortunes suddenly, so common in our time, may tend to restlessness in agricultural pursuits. But there is not one in a thousand who reaches the goal of his ambition. The gains of the farmer must be slow, and often it takes a lifetime to sum up results. He never need be out of employment, cousuming the earnings of former years. For him there is no dead line barring him from labor. The strength of declining years finds full scope of activity. Even children may be wisely employed, according to their strength and development. And while there is great difficulty in obtaining farm help, great care should be manifested lest the children be overworked, become discouraged, and turn away from farm life.

The competition so common in other lines of business is already upon us, and we must be at our best.

I know one in a peach-growing district who succeeds far beyond all his neighbors. His land is no better nor are his opportunities any greater than theirs. He confines his selections to a few varieties known as "shy bearers." It would not pay the ordinary peach-grower to cultivate them. They must have the best of cultivation, fertilizing and pruning. In this he is a marvelous success.

We must all take warning that success or failure is not bounded by a line fence. We must climb over the fence and learn how our neighbor succeeds, for the same wisdom, displayed in all other departments of fire life, would certainly make farming pay.

Infinite wisdom has prescribed rules for the success of every legitimate calling in this world. And certainly the first calling of the world can be no exception to these rules.

"He becometh poor that dealeth with a slack hand; but the hand of the diligent maketh rich."

"Seest thou a man diligent in business: he shall stand before kings."

"Go to the ant, thou sldggard: consider her ways and be wise; which having no guide, overseer or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest."

A woman may be said to have reached the years of discretion when she no longer tells her age.

A pensive wife is better than an expensive one.

Don't Talk Hard Times.

I never knew a man to be successful who was always talking about business being bad. Never allow yourself to dwell on the dark side of anything. You should refuse to talk about depressed markets or hard times. Learn to talk up, not down. Many business men become chronic grumblers and fault-finders.

Times are always hard with them. Other men get into a pessimistic rut, and never see brightness or success in anything. It is impossible for such people to prosper. Success is a delicate plant, and requires encouragement and sunshine.

Regard yourself as superior to the evils which surround you. Learn to dominate your environment; to rise above depressing influences. Look for the bright side of things, not the dark and gloomy side.

The world likes sunny, hopeful, bouyant characters; it shuns lugubrious prophets, who see only failure and disaster everywhere. The hopeful, cheerful men and women, who see success and longevity in their callings, are the ones who are sought after. It is as natural to try to avoid disagreeable, unpleasant people as it is to try to escape from the clouds and shadows into the sunlight.

Wall Paper!
Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a pointer pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store therefore I have no opposition. Is you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.

Finest and Cheapest Lines of WALL PAPER
