A PETITION.

Touch us gently, Time!
Let us glide adown thy stream
Gently as we sometimes glide
Through a quiet dream!

Humble voyagers are we,
Husband, wife and children three—
(One is lost—an angel, fled
To the azure overhead).

Touch us gently, Time!
We've not proud nor soaring wings:
Our ambition, our content,
Lies in simple things.

Humble voyagers are we,
O'er life's dim, unsounded sea,
Seeking only some calm clime—
Touch us gently, gentle Time!
—Barry Cornwall.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

BY HON. MARY CAVENDISH.

From the Lady's Pictorial.

"Everything is selling wonderfully well," remarked Lady Allenbury, gazing around her stall complacently, "except that terrible, dreadful tea-cosy." She waved a much-jeweled hand at the offending article, and the girl nearest to her laughed lightly.

"It's truly awful Aunt Janet," she replied, feelingly.

And it was. On a ground-work of khaki satin was embroidered a resplendent union-jack, underneath which was a group, chiefly in scarlet, of "Soldiers of the King." At least so ran the legend underneath the odd little figures. Otherwise they might have been confused with the inhabitants of some antediluvian ark.

Lady Allenbury gave a little despairing sigh.

"The duchess worked it herself," she said, turning to her niece beside her. "And none will buy it, and she'll be so hurt. What shall we do with it, Dorothy?"

"I should raffle it," replied the girl, rather indifferently.

She did not seem to be finding the bazaar very amusing. She was a pretty, fragile looking girl, with a delicate pink color, and a pair of blue eyes with dark shadows underneath them.

Lady Allenbury heaved another sigh, this time of relief.

"The very thing," she exclaimed. "Will you take it round, darling? Let me see, you must have some one to go with you to bother the people. Oh, there's George Fraser, the very person. George, come here; I want you to be very useful."

A good-looking boy in immaculate white flannels sauntered up lazily. He lifted his straw hat with its gunner ribbon to Lady Allenbury and the girls behind the stall. "Anything I can do?" he asked, good-humoredly.

"Yes, there's a good boy, and then I will invite you to tea to-morrow." Her ladyship seized the offending work of art. "You see this ghastly tea-cosy? We can't sell it, so Dorothy suggests it should be raffled. You and she can take it round. You know my niece, don't you? Mr. Fraser, Miss Seaton," the last words in the usual unintelligible mumble that passes for an introduction.

For the first time the boy looked at the girl who had been standing behind her aunt's ample form. Her face had lost a little of its delicate color, and as his eyes met hers he started with a little exclamation of surprise. Lady Allenbury observed the start, but did not see her niece's face.

"You know each other already? that's right," she said, easily. "Now trot off, there's good children, and don't come back with that abomination. Twenty-five shillings remember; not a penny less, or the duchess will never forgive me." And she turned back to the stall under the happy impression of having reunited two old friends. "He's a dear boy, George Fraser," she observed to the two girls who were helping her, "and he's just come back from the front. I didn't know he and Dorothy had met before." She turned to persuade a stout and apoplectic-looking gentlemen that the green velvet waistcoat, embroidered in pink silk, would be eminently becoming to his person.

Both girls were looking after the retreating figures of Miss Seton and her companion. Their quick young eyes had observed what Lady Allenbury's had not, that Dorothy went very unwillingly.

The girl in the pink hat was wishing that she had had Miss Seton's chance of spending half an hour with such an attractive-looking boy. She would willingly have changed places with the reluctant Dorothy. The other girl who knew Dorothy better was feeling sorry for her. She saw, without in the least understanding, "that some one had blundered," and guessed that her friend was not enjoying herself. She glanced tenderly at a diamond ring on her own finger, and thought of its connection with a man in South Africa. Perhaps this was why she could sympathise with Dorothy.

George Fraser found himself embracing an enormous and conspicuous tea cosy, and walking beside the one girl he had not expected to meet.

"Jolly thing, this," he said, nervously, clasping the tea cosy a little closer.

"I am glad you admire it," remarked Miss Seton, loftily. She looked straight in front of her.

It was disconcerting. He waited for her to speak next, but when she did it was a little disappointing. "Perhaps we had better invite some one to take a raffle ticket," she suggested, in quiet, indifferent tones.

"Yes. Let's try this old lady." His voice matched her; to perfection in its careless indifference. He did not guess how it hurt her.

They waylaid an elderly lady who proved favorable, pronounced the tea-cosy "too sweet and patriotic for words," and took three tickets, with the fervent hope that she might prove the lucky winner.

"You're sure to," assured George, audaciously. He felt better now the ice was broken, and by the time that 12 or 14 little tickets had been disposed of he ventured on the remark
