A FALSE STEP.

Sweet! thou hast trod on a heart;
Pass! there's a world full of men;
And women as fair as thou art
Must do such things now and then.

Thou only hast stepp'd unaware,
(Malice not one can impute);
And why should a heart have been there
In the way of a fair woman's foot?

It was not a stone that could trip
Nor was it a thorn that could rend;
Put up thy proud under-lip!
'Twas merely the heart of a friend.

And yet, peradventure one day
Thou, sitting alone at the glass,
Remarking the bloom gone away,
Where the smile in its dimplement was,

And seeking around thee in vain,
From hundreds who flatter'd before,
Such a word as "O, not in the main
Do I behold thee less precious, but more":

Thou wilt sigh, very like, on thy part—
"Of all I have known or can know,
I wish I had only that Heart
I trod upon ages ago!"

—Mrs. Browning.

THE FIRST CLASS IN SENTIMENT.

BY MAY BELLEVILLE BROWN.

From Town and Country.

"Education has done a great deal for you," said Leslie, regarding him critically, "but one thing was left out of your college curriculum, and that is sentiment."

Leslie Mason could say impertinent things without being taken in earnest and Steele Addison might have known better than to accept the challenge, but he was intensely practical, and still young enough to take himself very seriously.

"Yes, that's the way with you women," he retorted, in an aggrieved tone. "If a man isn't mawkishly sentimental and doesn't strike attitudes and declaim fervently of his devotion, you look on him as a sort of graven image. You count a calm, logical, well-trained mind as nothing. Any brainless fop can be softly sentimental, but it takes a man to be logical."

Leslie sprang from her chair by the library fire and crossed the room to the dictionary stand.

"Listen!" commanded she, striking an attitude and reading from the ponderous volume. "'Sentiment—from Latin sentire—to perceive by the sense of the mind, to feel. A thought prompted by passion or feeling; a state of mind in view of some subject; feeling toward or respecting some person or thing; disposition prompting to action or expression!' Steele Addison, you stand convicted on your own testimony. Sentiment is not only a stranger to you, but you do not know what it is. 'A thought prompted by some feeling,' is that necessarily mawkish? 'Feeling toward or respecting some person or thing;' must that be softly sentimental?"

Leslie warmed to her subject as she confronted him and continued:

"Sentiment need not be connected with a young woman or experienced only by brainless fops. You go on the street and see a man abusing a horse that has a load too heavy for it to pull. What is your first thought?"

The young man felt his feet touch known ground, and answered, calmly:

"That the driver ought to be punished for overloading his horse."

"But don't you have a thought for the poor animal, a feeling of pity, a desire to relieve it, a wish, however vague, that you might put it in a clover field for the rest of its days?"

"I can't say that I do," replied he, loftily. "According to Herbert Spencer's 'Synthetic Philosophy,' subhuman justice is imperfect in the sense that there exist multitudinous species, the sustentation of which depends on the wholesale destruction of other species, and the individual of a species shall receive all the consequences, good and evil, of its own nature—"

"Bother Herbert Spencer!" ejaculated Leslie, in a disgusted tone. "I am talking about people who have emotions. Your case is hopeless, unless you can prevail upon some one to establish a school of sentiment and enroll yourself at once in the infant class. There may be a chance that you can stop living in the top story all the time, and get down for a visit in your heart occasionally."

"There's another way that you women have," replied Steele. "Fencing isn't argument. But if you are willing to start a class in sentiment, Leslie, enroll me. Call it a kindergarten class if you want to, and you may advance me as you see me improving. At the same time I will endeavor to instruct you in logic. I feel sure that I can do you good, and it will be interesting, to say the least, to experiment on each other."

"I don't care to become a cold-hearted logician or a musty philosopher," answered Leslie, with a disdainful look, but I accept the offer, for the sake of the good that I may be able to do you. The class in sentiment will meet tomorrow afternoon and accompany its teacher to Rat alley. It is my afternoon at the Hermitage, and when you see some of our proteges in that part of town you will surely know something of one branch of the subject—pity. No," as he began to speak, "don't mention Herbert Spencer again to-day."

For three months the teacher of sentiment and the teacher of logic vied with each other in furnishing precepts and examples to further their individual theories. Steele accompanied Leslie on her pilgrimages to Rat Alley; he saw how old and young loved her, he looked on at the work of the Hermitage club, he listened to her enthusiastic plans, and—quoted Kant and Spencer, and discussed the survival of the fittest.

Leslie with her natural enthusiasm, had thrown herself into the work wherever she saw anything that needed doing, so Steele, as leisure permitted him, could see her in many lights—with a ruffled apron over her street gown, serving hot soup to chilled newsboys, deftly twirling Indian clubs for the instruction of a circle of working girls, demonstrating lower mathematic and the rudiments of English to a class of half-grown boys, or perhaps, in the sewing class exemplifying some little nicety of needlework.

One of Leslie's days at the Hermitage, Steele dropped in about the time for her to go home, and found the place deserted, save for an elderly lady who was helping for the afternoon.

"Where is Miss Mason?" queried Steele, after greeting Mrs. Morrison.

"Oh, Mr. Addison!" began that lady, somewhat excitedly. "Sam Howard has been having trouble with Marietta, and Leslie went down there quite awhile ago to help make peace, and I don't dare to leave until the others come, but I'm beginning to get frightened, for if Sam has been drinking—"

Steele had all the necessary information, and, forgetting politeness, rushed from the house, taking the front steps almost at one leap. He knew what it meant if Sam Howard had been drinking. It was with many misgivings that the Hermitage patrons had viewed the marriage, not long before, of these two young people of the district. Sam and Marietta were hard working young people, and cared for each other, but he would indulge in drink on rare occasions, and one drink meant a spell of crazy drunkenness.

Reaching the tenement where they lived, he sprang up the stairs to the little suite of rooms that the Hermitage club had furnished as a wedding present to the Howards, and burst open the door.

Against the wall crouched the young wife, her eyes horror stricken, her face white with terror, except where the blood was gathering under the skin from a freshly-dealt blow on her cheek.

Between Marietta and her husband Leslie had interposed herself. The man's face, with its bloodshot eyes, was that of a madman. He had evidently struck Marietta with his hand, but, with increased wrath that anyone should attempt to thwart him, he had caught up a stick of wood from the floor, and even as she tried to soothe him he had the bludgeon raised threateningly. With a spring Steele was upon the man, who, though powerful naturally, and with the added strength of frenzy, was no match for the newcomer, whose muscles were backed by a rage that a man should raise his hand against any woman, and Leslie, of all women. There was a short, sharp struggle, and then Sam was overpowered and forced into a chair, where he sat in sullen apathy.

When Leslie would have thanked him and offered to help the frightened woman, Steele, with an air of command, ordered her to desist.

"Go straight back to the Hermitage," he ordered peremptorily, "and stay there till I come. This is no place for you. Have no fear he added, with still smoldering rage; "I shall spare the life of this protege, who so nearly killed you. When I have left some one to take care of his wife and to watch him, I will get a carriage and come to the Hermitage for you. Go at once!"

And Leslie, so used to commanding and being obeyed, went down the stairs without a word. She did not wait for him, however, but as soon as she was out of the alley ordered a carriage to take her home.

She arrived late for dinner, cold and tired, and with unstrung nerves but as she knew that Steele would follow to inquire after her welfare, she put away her inclination to go to bed for a good cry, and, changing her gown, put on a brave face for the occasion, though her heart was anything but brave.

"It is a waste of time," she confided to herself, ambiguously, as she sat by the fire. "Men are all alike—they do not care for anyone but themselves, and Steele is only more honest than the rest in owning that he does not care, and does not care whether he cares or not. Of course, he is a gentleman, and would not strike a woman as Sam did poor Marietta, but he has no heart, and that is bad enough."

It was a very mournful girl that Steele found a few moments later, but he was evidently too excited to notice her dejection.

"He has a new argument that he thinks will crush me," she said to herself, in dismay. "And, oh, dear! I believe a fly could crush me this evening."

"Leslie," exclaimed Steele, "I have come to tell you—"

"Please, Steele," she entreated, holding up an imploring hand, "don't speak of Kant or Darwin. My opinions are firm as ever, but I am so tired—"

Steele was holding both her hands and beaming down upon her as he stood by her chair.

"Kant and Darwin may have been estimable men, my dear, but for me just at this time they have never existed. I have come to ask you to advance me to the first class in sentiment. Like a good pupil, I have been studying at home. I have learned to carry one of your pictures next my heart and to sleep with one of your handkerchiefs under my pillow. I press all the flowers that you put into my buttonhole, and I stole a little curl of brown hair that used to lie just back of your ear. I think brown eyes with yellow lights in them are the sweetest eyes in the world, and my heart thumps like a trip hammer when you put your hand on my arm. Not content with thinking of you by day and dreaming of you by night, I have called the office boy Leslie, and addressed my grayheaded employer as Miss Mason. Having learned all this, I come to tell you that as the dictionary says, I 'have a thought prompted by passion or feeling;' that I am in a 'state of mind in view of some subject, namely, yourself; that my disposition prompts action and expression—Why, Leslie!"

Her face has dropped forward on the hands that hold hers, and he feels two tears on his fingers. He stoops and lifts her into his arms.

"The school of logic will disband," announced Steele a little later, "yet the principles are true, for falling in love with you is the most logical thing I ever did."

"The school of sentiment will also disband," replied Leslie, "as its only pupil has just graduated from the first class."

"In that case," added he, with a triumphant last word, as he dropped his lips to hers, "this is but a commencement exercise."

Temptations.

This is a somewhat cruel world, because false estimates of what constitute happiness have thrown so many temptations in our way. There is an overvaluation of money and an undervaluation of moral principle. The race is so eager, so wild, so intoxicating that we forget everything except to get ahead of our competitors, and the means we take to accomplish this are justified, we think, by the fact of winning. As a consequence, the tone of life is lowered and we measure a man by what he has, not by what he is. The bank account rather than the character excites our envy. Riches and the pursuit of riches are the bases of orderly society, provided riches and rectitude are interwoven; but riches without the rectitude are of no benefit to any one. Men and women are too ready to pay a thoughtless, a reckless price for the goods they covet. Fame is worth something and so is reputation, if it is honestly earned, but if you compromise your honor you are practically selling your soul. What we need in this generation is a heroic dose of that old-fashioned corrective—moral principle. The only real man, the only man who is recognized in Heaven, is the upright and downright man. It may be hard to persuade the public of this truth, but it is the truth nevertheless, and cannot be evaded or ignored. If a nation or an individual is to live comfortably it must live virtuously. False standards mean false and wretched lives, and the logic of events will make that fact known with terrific emphasis.

Honesty comes first, and after that anything you can get. When you give up the honesty, the purity of heart, in exchange for anything else, you suddenly find that you have been cheated out of your best self. The object of life is not to acquire, not that solely, unless it be to acquire character. Your temptation to gash your conscience is based on a promise which will never be kept, or if the worldly goods are delivered you will be robbed of something worth a great deal more. Stiffen your conscience until it will not feel the force of temptation, and then you will be ready for life, for death and for any other world to which you may go when your term on earth expires. The only thing to set men right and keep them right is the Sermon on the Mount. It is the thought of others which consecrates the thought of self. A staff and scrip with a clean heart will do more for human happiness than whatever else you may desire, and until we get back to that fact and to a full appreciation of it we shall fail in the great essentials.—Lancaster Examiner.

When a Joke is Not a Joke.

Mrs. Rena A. Osborn, in the Epitomist.

Many a young man loves to joke, and finds it not little difficult to know when a joke is seasonable or unseasonable, when it will meet with a laughing response, or make him an enemy for life.

The one thing to be considered before letting one's spirits run away with one, and embarking on a joke of any kind, is to consider whether it be a joke that is harmless in its character or not, and then to see whether it is in good or bad taste.

A joke is no joke if it gives pain or discomfort to anyone, and it becomes a deliberate insult when it causes a blush to rise on a young girls cheek, or brings the flush of hurt feelings on the faces of those whom one ought to honor.

The fact is, it is better to refrain from joking, except with those of your own age and standing, who will understand the drift of your mind and wit.

Practical jokes of all kinds are, as a rule, vulgar and inadmissible after a very early age. Grown up men of good birth do not in this century, when good manners count for much, go about like the characters in "Verdant Green," playing jokes of a most unpleasant character on all their friends. A good joke which is harmless in its tendency is often amusing, and makes a pleasant break in the dull routine of a country party; but a joke that causes personal discomfort, or, worse still, mental trouble, is to be avoided for the sake of those you call your friends, and for yourself; for jokes more often than not bring disgrace and ruin on the perpetrator of them.

Bees Stopped the Work.

A swarm of bees, says a despatch from Salt Lake, Utah, took possession of the excavation work being done for the Keith building on South Main street, and for an hour totally routed 25 or 30 workmen. Several attempts were made to hive the bees, but with no other result than to arouse their anger. One or two horses were stung by the bees and retaliated by kicking holes in a wagon and nearly killing the driver. Finally the foreman in charge of the forces at work on the foundation armed his men with tin pans, cow bells and other noise-producing instruments, filled a bushel basket with grape leaves, and to the discordant music of the tinware finally got the bees to enter the basket. They were promptly covered and carefully taken far away. The spectacle of a swarm of bees causing a total suspension of work on a building on the principal business street was a remarkable occurrence. Several hundred spectators were punctured by the busy insects.

Providential Difference.

"Dey tells me," said Br'er Williams, getting off the train after a protracted absence from home, "dat de harrican come 'long en tuck Br'er Thomas's house off de face er de airth?"

"Hit sho' did!"

"Well, I well knowed de Lawd would sen' somepin' lak dat on 'im. Hits done fer a wise purpose."

"But—de harrican tuk yo' house, too, Br'er Williams!"

Then did Br'er Williams take off his brass-rimmed spectacles and mop his perspiring brow, as he groaned:

"De ways er Providence is past findin' out!"

A Financier.

"There is a small cross-eyed boy living in this city, who, if he doesn't lose his life through just retribution, will grow up to become a great financier," declared Jones. "For some time my wife has possessed a yellow purp that has no earthly excuse for living. But she thinks that he is the finest dog in the city, and spends most of her time hugging and kissing his dirty little nose. Finally the dog worship became so unbearable to me that I resolved to end the nuisance. Chancing to meet a small cross-eyed boy one day, I said to him:

"'See here, boy, do you want to earn a dollar?'

"'Sure,' said he.

"'Well, then,' said I, 'you go up to my house, watch your chance and steal the yellow cur that you will find hanging around there. When you get him, bring him down to my office and get your dollar.'

"Within two hours the boy was back with the cur tied to a rope.

"'What will I do with him, boss?' he asked, after I paid him.

"'I don't care,' I snapped, 'drown him if you want to.'

"That night I discovered my wife in tears, and I was informed between sobs that poor, dear little Fido was missing. The next day she had an advertisement inserted in all the papers offering $10 for his return. The third day she met me joyfully at the door and announced that Fido had been found.

"'Where?' I asked, concealing a groan.

"'A little boy brought him back,' she answered.

"'What kind of a boy?' I asked, suspiciously?

"'A small cross-eyed boy with the most honest face that I ever saw on a boy. I gave him $10, it being all I had, and told him if he would go down and see you that I knew you would be glad to add $5 to it.'

"But the boy didn't show up. As a matter of fact, I hadn't the slightest idea he would. I wouldn't mind giving him $5 if he would call."

Psychology of Hair.

Coarse black hair indicates power of character, with a tendency to sensuality.

Straight stiff black hair and beard indicate coarse, strong, rigid and straightforward personality, says the Liverpool Post.

Fine hair generally denotes exquisite sensibilities; flat, clinging straight hair a melancholy but constant habit.

Harsh, upright hair is the sign of a reticent and sour spirit, a stubborn and cruel character.

Coarse red hair and whiskers are accompanied by violent animal passions, but some force of individuality.

Auburn hair, on the contrary, denotes the highest order of sentiment and intensity of feeling, purity of thought and the greatest capacity for pain or pleasure.

Crisp, curly hair, we regret to say, is indicative of a hasty, impetuous and rash character, and generally, light hair is characteristic of a lymphatic and indolent constitution.

There is no doubt that the coloring matter of the hair may be in some way affected, or may affect, the disposition, for it is an odd thing how often the surplus in red hair or the carbon in black appears in the individual's acts and thoughts.

During the fiscal year of the Pension Department which closed on June 1, 5604 pensioners were added to the rolls on account of the Spanish war, 38,152 were taken off by death, leaving the number 907,735.

Wall Paper!
Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a pointer pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store therefore I have no opposition. Is you think I can't save you money, come and see me and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and I will tell you what your job will cost, and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.
