vailed. The veneer of civilization, more or less thin, cracked; cowardice, brutality and weakness appeared. Struggling men blocked the entrances; they gashed their hands on the windows; they even piled up against the partitions like trapped and savage animals. Shrieking women and children ran from side to side of the cabin. An immense negro, jammed half in, half out, a shattered window, contributed the element of grotesqueness, as he gesticulated frantically, filling the air with alternate prayers and curses.

With death at hand, Norwood ceased to desire it. Springing toward an exit, he thought of the two women and returned. The girl, who was trying to raise the elder woman to her feet, looked at him wistfully. "My mother's heart is weak," she said hurriedly. "The shock has brought on an attack—I can't move her."

"Just a moment," cried he. "Don't stir from here, and I'll see what can be done."

When he gained the slippery upper deck he found order coming out of chaos, through the nerve of the officers and the calmness of some of the passengers. Boats were lowered, but only to pick up a few progressive spirits who in the panic had seized the life preservers and thrown themselves into the water. Lines had been cast from one steamer to the other, lashing them together; and men, working like madmen—or heroes—were passing the women and children to safety over the rail.

Norwood ran back. As the girl turned her white face mutely toward him he felt a glow of admiration for her self control.

"All right," he said encouragingly. "There is no danger. Are you strong enough to help me lift her?"

She nodded and together they raised the almost unconscious woman. She was no light weight and he was still weak, but they succeeded in half leading, half carrying her on deck. The doomed steamer was rapidly settling and water was running into the cabin when they left it. He shouted to the deckhands who were beginning to cast off the lines and a dozen brawny arms lifted the women to the opposite deck.

The men followed and almost immediately the boat they had left plunged, bow first, and, with a rush through the blackness, disappeared.

As the girl had been drawn over the rail after her mother there was a cry of "Why, Dorothy! Dorothy Moore!" Instantly the two were the center of an excited and solicitous group and Norwood went below.

He was among the first to land when the boat entered the slip, but he lingered on the outskirts of the throng until the face he looked for appeared. Although occupied with her mother the girl's eyes more than once roved eagerly over the crowd, and, with a quickened beating of his heart, he felt instinctively that she searched for him. The idea cheered him—he felt less friendless, yet he kept out of sight until they entered a carriage and were driven away.

The events of the past few hours had added no brilliancy to his prospects; nevertheless, as he turned towards Market street he no longer felt life to be an unprofitable episode disturbing the blessed calm of nonexistence. He exulted in the mere fact that his will controlled his movements—that he was not a thing for the sport of the waves, and, squaring his shoulders to the wind, he thrust his hands deeply into his shabby pockets. With an astonished stare he drew them out again. Dangling to one finger by a glittering chain was a little purse of suede—the kind women affect. For a moment he looked at it in bewilderment—the memory stung him. He had twice picked it up once to restore it to the rightful owner—the second time to pocket it himself. In the excitment he had forgotten it. Open it revealed the unaccustomed glitter of gold and silver, and at the sight he realized how famished he was. He transferred some of the silver to a breast pocket, replaced the purse and boarded an uptown car.

Some hours later, warmed, fed and comforted, he sat down in a decent room and made an inventory. The purse contained $40 in gold, some silver, and attached to a bit of ribbon, a little silver Filipino coin. A card inscribed with Miss Moore's name in full and a number on California street offered every facility for the return of his treasure trove.

That night the young man was too worn out for reflection, but over his breakfast the next morning he resolved to break a commandment—and the gold—to clothe himself decently, make a fresh start in life, and in time liquidate his indebtedness to Miss Moore.

Perhaps his lane had neared a turn, for a few days afterward he secured a small clerkship in a wholesale house; but so very small was the clerkship that several months had elapsed before the purse assumed its former comfortable proportions.

In the meantime, with security against the necessities of the hour, youth reasserted itself, and quickened with the never-satisfied longing after the happiness it claims as its birthright. An illusory picture—born of a dream and shaped by fancy—in which Dorothy Moore was the central figure, occupied much of his thoughts. He assured himself that some reason was due her for the detention of her property during so long a period, and wasted considerable time and stationery in attempting to give one. Without any conscious wish to stir her imagination or awaken her interest, his few unsigned words of thanks and explanation yet revealed more of his darkest hour than he was aware. In them were sufficient food for curiosity and sympathy—sworn enemies to forgetfulness. Of his reason for retaining the little Filipino coin he gave no hint.

A week later a chance paragraph in a newspaper informed him that Dorothy and her mother had gone to New York and might shortly sail for Europe.

In the three years that followed, Norwood's success pointed the words of the poet:

There is a tide in the affairs of men
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.

In the various turnings of his lane he made many acquaintances and a few friends, who occasionally drew him, unwillingly enough, out of the routine of business into the social pleasures of his age and kind. So it chanced that one evening, watching his opportunity to say good night to his hostess and escape from a crowded dance, he looked across the shoulders of the throng and intercepted the level glances of a pair of brown eyes. He promptly changed his farewell to a petition, and five minutes later he was saying to the owner of the eyes, "Let me take you out of this crush. There is a corner near that window where air is a possibility."

"I know your name very well, Mr. Norwood," said Dorothy Moore. "Cousin Jack has so often mentioned you in his letters."

"Jack and I were old college friends," he replied, "but I had lived here for two years before I ran across him again."

"What puzzles me," the girl went on, "is that your face is familiar too. It struck me when I first saw you a few moments ago—and yet I know we have never met before."

"Once," he said, "three years ago."

"Why, I—is it possible? I didn't know"——

"That at our first meeting I was tempted to beg from you—and later on I did worse—applied your property to my own needs—or, to be plain, stole from you?" questioned Norwood.

She made a movement of astonishment, and her fan slid from her lap. As she bent to restore it, something in his attitude or gesture brought recollection in a flood. Dorothy paled, then flushed crimson.

"It can't be true," she began then stopped, watching with fascinated eyes while he took from his breast pocket a case and held out his hand. On the palm lay a little silver Filipino coin.

"And you are really that poor boy?" she exclaimed impulsively. "No wonder your face haunted me. Oh, why did you never let us know—when we owed you so much?"

Norwood's eyes roved from her eager face to that bit of silver. "I should like to return it to you," he said irrelevantly. "It has been a veritable mascot, yet at times a source of misery."

"Why do you say that? It sounds dreadfully like a riddle, and I was never good at guessing them," said the girl, holding out her hand for the coin.

As her soft fingers touched Norwood's palm his own closed over them, and he replied: "Because it might have been the gift of a"——

"Friend?" supplemented demurely, as he hesitated."

He tightened his clasp. "It could be the gift of a—lover," he insisted.

"Oh, hush!" murmured Dorothy, rising. "Someone is looking." Then, she added: "But come and see us tomorrow—and don't forget to bring the coin."

One of the standing jokes that the public make new reporters the victims of, if the new reporter will allow himself to be the victim, is to tell the new fellow that the train has run off the bridge. The reporter may go humping himself to the river bridge, to see the wreck, but he never sees it. When he gets back to the office, or even before he gets back, it dawns on him that the train has, of course, run off the bridge on its way to the city.

Questions for Boys and Girls to Think About.

If you are good at guessing or answering, here are a few questions you can wrestle with:

You can see any day a white horse, but did you ever see a white colt?

How many different kinds of trees grow in your neighborhood, and what are they good for?

Why does a horse eat grass backwards and a cow forward?

Why does a hop-vine wind one way and a bean-vine the other?

Where should a chimney be the larger, at the top or bottom, and why?

Can you tell why a horse when tethered with a rope always unravels it, while a cow always twists it into a kinky knot.

How old must a grape vine be before it begins to bear?

Can you tell why leaves turn upside down just before a rain?

What wood will bear the greatest weight before breaking?

Why are all cow paths crooked and none straight.—Northwestern Advocate.

Mrs. Gadd—"That horrid Mrs. Candid actually had the audacity to tell me to my face that I was a mean, spiteful old gossip."

Mrs. Holmes—"Dear me! Who told her, I wonder."

Silas—"Did any one have any red ears at the huskin' bee?"

Cyrus—"Yeas; Zeke Crabtree had two when Luther Crawfoot caught him kissin' his gal."

Husband—"Get something cheap, pet, I haven't paid him for my last birthday present yet."

Why Not Cure Your Cough or Cold?

WESTMINSTER, April 10th, 1890.

MR. JOS. B. BOYLE:

Dear Sir:—For many years I have suffered intensely, on taking cold, from a very troublesome cough, for which I have used a number of various remedies, and obtained but TEMPORARY RELIEF. During the past Spring I was again troubled with the same cough, and through a friend was induced to try YOUR Pectoral Syrup, which not only gave almost INSTANT RELIEF, but a PERMANENT CURE. It gives me great pleasure to say that I believe it to be the best remedy I ever used for the purpose for which it is re commended. Hoping that any person afflicted as I was may be fortunate enough to give it a trial, I am, Truly yours,

Wall Paper! Wall Paper!

I wish to call the attention of my friends and the public in general to the fact that I now am ready to show one of the ever exhibited in this county, bought direct from the factory, in full bundle lots, so you get it only from second hands, no two or three profits coming off it. Of course the consumer pays them all. Sam Jones says it takes a pointer pup nine days to get his eyes open. I have known some people to get their's open in fifteen minutes in a wall paper deal. They thought it was two pieces instead of one, and the border they did not understand, &c. That is always their plea. Remember I am the only paper hanger in the county that carries a stock and don't have the expense of running a store therefore I have no opposition. Is you think I can't save you money, come and see me and I will tell you what your job will cost, and bring size of your room, or send size by mail and send samples and convince you that Gladhill's is the place to save twenty-five cents on a dollar on all Wall Papers.
